The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. Mr. Speaker, I have the honor to report to the House that one of my messengers has returned and makes the following report: that he visited the room of JAMES M. HUMPHREY, at the Seaton House, and was informed by Mrs. Humphrey that her husband must be in this House, or some other good place, [laughter,] for he had not been home this evening.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a question of order. Just before the warrant was issued Mr. HUMPHREY appeared here and asked if his name was in the warrant, and was assured that he was reported as being present. He is in the House now, and I do not wish any imputation cast on him for being in "some other good place." [Laughter.]

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. The messenger also called at the Seaton House for THOMAS N. STILWELL and found his room vacant. He was not to be found there. The same messenger called at the Avenue House at the room of SIDNEY T. HOLMES, and found that he was absent. He also called at the rooms of THAMAR C. SLOAN and of STEPHEN F. WILSON at the same hotel, and they could not be found. He also called upon FREDERICK A. PIKE, who informed him that he desired a message sent to the House that he had left in consequence of being ill; that he was absolutely too unwell to return, and that he wished this excuse to be presented to the House.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. Mr. HUMPHREY is present in his seat.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. The messenger called at the room of BENJAMIN F. LOAN, who reported that he had remained in the House as long as he possibly could; that he was sick in the early part of the evening, and had gone home and taken his bed, and was absolutely too sick to return to the House.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I move that Mr. LOAN, in consideration of his recent great effort made here in relation to the impeachment of the President, be excused. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. Before the motion is put I would inquire whether members are aware of any epidemic prevailing just at this time. [Laughter.]

Mr. LE BLOND. I am not sure but that trichina is afloat here.

Mr. SCHENCK. I notice that every one seems to be unwell. [Laughter.]

Mr. LE BLOND. I wish to say this in reference to Mr. LOAN, that for one I am opposed to excusing him, or excusing any other member who is as well able to be here as the rest of us. It is unfair, and especially so to excuse a man who had the physical ability to move in reference to the impeachment of the President to the extent that he went, and have the amount of bile that he poured forth upon us. He is certainly physically able to be here now, and I am opposed to his being excused. He relieved himself of that quantity of bile and must therefore be in better health to-day.

Mr. GRINNELL. I make the point of order that the amount of bile connected with the gentleman from Missouri is not under consideration, and that it is out of order to refer to his bile.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to a question of order, as to the regularity of any motion to excuse a member whose name is in the Speaker's warrant and for whose arrest an order is out, until the warrant is regularly returned with the body of the prisoner, and he is called upon to make an excuse. This is a sort of pardon in advance. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair presumes that it is competent for the House to excuse a member.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the name of Mr. HUMPHREY be stricken from the warrant, as it was erroneously inserted. I understand that he is represented as being here.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. Mr. HUMPHREY has been here all the evening.

The question was taken on Mr. SCHENCK's motion, and it was agreed to, and Mr. HUMPHREY's name was stricken from the record.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. One of my messengers has also visited the Washington House and the room occupied by Hon. JOHN A. BINGHAM, [laughter,] and found him absent. He has not been found, and search will be made for him until he is found and presented at the bar. I make this report, Mr. Speaker, that members may know what progress we are making. I have given the returns of four different messengers.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. How many members have been brought here?

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. This is the first return.

Mr. HILL. I understand that Mr. BINGHAM, with certain other gentlemen, escaped from the custody of the House to-night by climbing through the window of the barber's shop, and on account of the extraordinary agility shown by a gentleman of Mr. BINGHAM's age I move that his name be stricken from the warrant.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. FINCK. I wish to inquire if the Sergeant-at-Arms has made his report altogether? Has he got through with it? [Cries of "No, no."] I move, then, that he make another effort to get these gentlemen into the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion has been made practically. The order of the House is that he shall bring them here.

Mr. ALLISON. He must execute the Speaker's warrant.

Mr. FINCK. Then what was the use of his making this return?

Mr. CULLOM. He reports progress so as to satisfy the House that he is at work.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms will, of course, continue his efforts to execute the order of the House and bring in members.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I have only to remark—

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can proceed only by the unanimous consent of the House.

No objection was made.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I have only to remark that if the bill under consideration is just, it appears to me proper that it should pass, without keeping men out of bed at so late an hour, or so early an hour of the morning. If it is unjust, then it should be withdrawn by its author.

Mr. MILLER. I would ask the gentleman what the bill is.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I understand that the bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] and that it is intended to prescribe rules for the United States courts. Am I right? ["Yes," "yes."] I am not so oblivious as some gentlemen may suppose. [Laughter.] If the bill is not just, then let it be withdrawn. Why keep all these gentlemen here from their slumbers in view of their arduous duties of to-morrow? I do not know much about parliamentary usage here, but I know if a transaction of this kind was going on in the Territory of Dakota [laughter] it would be regarded as extremely disgraceful. [Laughter.] My impression is (knowing what I do of its Governor) that it would either cease before three o'clock in the morning or he would boot that august body out of the Capitol. [Laughter.] That is all I have to say.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared, and reported that in pursuance of the warrant of the Speaker he had arrested, and now had in custody at the bar of the House, Mr. HART, of New Jersey, and Mr. SINGREAVES, of New Jersey.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. HART, you have been absent during the session of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to render for thus being absent?

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I have any excuse that would be satisfactory to the House. I left the House at a time a vote was being taken; the vote was running in such a way that I got the impression that the House would probably soon adjourn. I thought that under the circumstances, in consideration of the delicate health of the Speaker, when it was generally known to the House that he had had a bad sore throat for the last three or four days, and that he was not in a condition to go through a night session, especially such a night session as we would probably have here, the House would not insist upon his being kept here. And I supposed every one else in the House would feel as I felt.

Besides, it so happened that I had the misfortune to be once before absent during this day's session, and I was brought before the House to give my excuse for being absent. During the time I was then absent I made an engagement that was exceedingly agreeable. [Laughter.] The engagement was of such a character that I did not see how I could well avoid meeting it. I felt that I was bound to meet that engagement, because it involved some very important considerations. [Laughter.] But I have come here to show my respect to the House, although I felt that perhaps there may have been some unjust and unfair discrimination in my case. I was very comfortable in my bed, [laughter,] in a first-class public house, where I had retired with the consciousness of having done my entire duty as a public man, [great laughter,] and as has been suggested by a gentleman near me, not conscious of having been guilty of any offense before the law or before the country. But I was routed out of my bed, and brought here to answer for some high crime or misdemeanor, of which I am not conscious of having been guilty. At the same time I am ready here and elsewhere to answer for my conduct. I trust I have not been, even unconsciously, disrespectful to the House, and I am ready now to do my entire duty.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would ask the gentleman if he is ready now to take the test oath?

Mr. HART. Yes, sir; or any other oath that is reasonable.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the gentleman be excused upon the payment of the usual fees.

Mr. HART. That proposition is very liberal. [Laughter.]

The motion of Mr. ALLISON was agreed to.

Mr. HART. If it is in order, I move to reconsider the vote just taken, and move to lay that motion on the table. [Great laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not necessary.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. SINGREAVES, you have been absent from the session of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to render for your absence?

Mr. SINGREAVES. I have no excuse other than the fact that, having a previous engagement, I left the House under the supposition that it would soon adjourn.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Almost every member when brought to the bar has stated by way of excuse that he had a "previous engagement." I would like to know what is meant by these "previous engagements."

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I move that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SINGREAVES] be released on the payment of the usual fine.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire what would be the effect of the adoption of a motion to suspend operations under the call. Would it release from responsibility those members who are still out?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would not. The absentees arrested could be brought in at one o'clock to-morrow, under the resolution of the House.

Mr. BEAMAN. Would not an adjournment have the same effect?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Precisely.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. Do I understand that those members who are not now arrested would not be arrested if the proposition I have suggested should be adopted?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No more arrests could be made at present. The execution of the call would be suspended until to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I move, then, if it be in order—

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask the gentleman to yield to me that I may offer a resolution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I will hear it read.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That this House has heard with intense satisfaction the eloquent speech of the Delegate from Dakota, and that five hundred thousand copies be printed in the English, German, and Choctaw languages.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I cannot yield for that. I see that the Sergeant-at-Arms is ready to make a report. I defer the motion I was about to make.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. I have the honor to report the action of a messenger who went in search of Hon. Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. BRANDEGEE was found in bed, and he assured the messenger that he had left the House on account of severe sickness, and that he was positively too unwell to come here.

I desire also to report that my messenger was obstructed. At Willard's Hotel he was prevented by the clerk from visiting the rooms occupied by members. The clerk refused to communicate to the messenger the number of members' rooms or to allow him to visit them. I will read the report of the messenger—

Mr. CONKLING. I beg leave to interrupt this report for the purpose of raising a point of order. I submit to the Chair that all these narrations of messengers are out of order. If there is anybody to be produced here under arrest, that is a different matter; but this history—this Pilgrim's Progress—which is related here by way of hearsay, is, I submit, not in order. I think that we get enough from this night session, without any more than properly belongs to it.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I believe that it is very proper for the Sergeant-at-Arms, in making his return to the House, to give a statement of what transpired while he was endeavoring to execute the commands of the House.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. The Speaker and the House will pardon me. I may be in error in the execution of my duty; but on a former occasion, when I myself was out five hours without making a return to the House, it was attempted to cast censure upon me, and my name was attempted to be placed upon the Journal. I have therefore made these reports to obviate such objections.

Mr. CONKLING. It is quite proper, so far as the Sergeant-at-Arms is concerned, that he should set himself right. I do not mean to cast any reflection upon him; but it is hardly fair that narrations should be read here which in the estimation of some gentlemen's constituents may be a reflection upon them. I submit it is not worth while, nor is it called for, that we should have these narrations read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed by those who have larger experience here that the only parties who can address the Presiding Officer beside members are the messengers from the Senate and from the President of the United States. All others communicate in writing, even the Clerk of the House. The Sergeant-at-Arms is undoubtedly required to report in writing.

The Sergeant-at-Arms reports he has now in custody at the bar Mr. FARNSWORTH, Mr. GARFIELD, and Mr. STOKES.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, you have been absent from the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I think I had better take the benefit of the presumptions in my favor and stand mute.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the gentleman be excused on the payment of the usual fees.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. GARFIELD, you have been reported absent without leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. GARFIELD. I left the House at half past four with a bad headache, which I mentioned to Mr. ALLISON. I have been twice excused from attending this day's session, but the gallantry and pluck evinced in this fight have induced me to return, though not quite well.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has been excused, and will therefore be discharged from custody.

Mr. STOKES, you have been absent from the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, I had a conversation with Mr. BOUTWELL, of Massachusetts, just before half past four o'clock p. m., and he thought the House would soon adjourn without difficulty. I went to my colleague, Mr. LEFTWICH, and proposed we should pair off, and we did pair off. I was not well, and Mr. LEFTWICH said he would make the statement to the House during the roll-call or immediately afterward. They were then calling the roll. I supposed the House would remain but a few moments longer, and I did not see any necessity for my staying. It is the first time I ever absented myself from the House. In the Thirty-Sixth Congress I never missed a roll-call but once during the whole time. If I had known the Opposition would have been so courageous, bold, and determined in standing out to thwart the legislation of the country I would have remained in my seat.

Mr. GRINNELL. I move the gentleman be excused.

Mr. LE BLOND. On the payment of the usual fees. I am not sure whether we ought to grant that, for the gentleman has reflected upon the motives of this side of the House. I do not presume our action is revolutionary or for the purpose of obstructing legitimate legislation. It is simply to let the country know what is proposed to be done under the gag-law. It is the only motive we have, and it is the right which belongs to us as members. The imputation undertaken to be sent out, I say, on behalf of the minority, is unfounded; we simply desire to have fair and equal justice.

Mr. STOKES. My remark was intended for the opposite side of the House, that they were endeavoring to prevent legislation so far as discussion was concerned.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman must confine himself to the reasons why he should be excused.

Mr. STOKES. I have said all I want to.

The amendment was agreed to; and the motion, as amended, was adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will now entertain the point of order raised by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I was inquiring of the Chair whether the effect of the resolution already passed, to bring all the delinquent members not yet arrested to answer at the bar of the House at one o'clock to-morrow—

A MEMBER. To-day.

Mr. SCHENCK. No; this is a legislative day, and it is still yesterday. [Laughter.] My inquiry was whether that resolution will not stand even if we now dispense with the farther proceedings under the call. I suppose that a distinctive, substantive order of that kind under parliamentary law will stand.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it would stand.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move then that all further present proceedings under the call be dispensed with, leaving the resolution to stand, with a view to going on with the business before the House.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. GRINNELL. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. GRINNELL and ELDRIDGE.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty-five; noes none.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I move that the House now adjourn, and on that I call the yeas and nays.

Mr. ORTH. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. ORTH and NOELL.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty-four; noes none.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms is ready to report to the House, and in the opinion of the Chair his report is in order.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. I have the honor to report that I have brought before the bar of the House EBON C. INGERSOLL, JAMES W. PATTERSON, and GEORGE W. ANDERSON, being absent without leave.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. INGERSOLL, you have been absent from the session of the House without leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would like before proceeding to understand my status, [laughter,] whether I am to be regarded as a belligerent or public enemy; and if a belligerent whether I am to be accorded belligerent rights; or whether I am an American citizen—

A MEMBER. Without distinction of color. [Laughter.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not desire to waive any of my political rights. I want to know whether this is a proceeding in rem or in personam or a criminal proceeding; and if it be a criminal proceeding, whether I am not entitled to trial by jury? I wish the Chair to decide that question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has propounded the usual question to the member, to state the reason for his absence.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I submit whether I am to be deprived of my liberty. I understand I may be fined.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has no authority to make any order in reference to a fine.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If I am without defense I will challenge the whole array. [Laughter.]

Mr. HIGBY. The gentleman says he does not want to waive his rights; I would like to know if anything waved when he went out of the cloak-room? [Laughter.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. To the best of my knowledge I saw two coat-tails waving in the air. [Laughter.] Mr. Speaker, I believe there is an old law of the District of Columbia which requires honest citizens to be in bed soon after twelve o'clock. In compliance with that law and my own wishes I left this House about that time, after all reasonable effort had been made, on my part, to adjourn. I thought after I had exhausted all effort to bring the parties to an agreement with reference to this bill I could be of no further service here, and so like a good citizen I went home to bed and was sound asleep when the Sergeant-at-Arms aroused me.

Mr. MILLER. I move that the gentleman be excused upon paying the costs and upon the promise that he will not jump out of the window again. [Laughter.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. I deny that I jumped out of the window.

The motion to excuse the gentleman was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. ANDERSON, you have been absent from the session of this House without leave. What excuse have you to render?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not know that I have any very good excuse to offer. I will only say to the gentlemen who live on the west side of the Mississippi river that I am chairman of the Committee on Mileage, and they had better vote right on this question of excusing me or their mileage may be cut down. [Laughter.]

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move that the gentleman be excused on the payment of the usual fees.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. PATTERSON, you have been absent from the sessions of this House without leave. What excuse have you to render for your absence?

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, it was not out of any disrespect for the House that I left it, but purely out of respect to myself.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is sound; do not say another word.

Mr. PATTERSON. Two other gentlemen went with me, the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] who asserted that this was a clearly unconstitutional case, and that it was rather the duty of every good man in the House to absent himself; and then again the distinguished chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia, who said there was a rule of the levy court of this District that every honest man should be at home before twelve o'clock, especially if he is a member of Congress, and for that reason I thought it was rather incumbent on me to escort the gentleman home. [Laughter.] That is the only excuse which I have to offer.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move that the gentleman from New Hampshire be excused on the payment of the usual fees.

The motion was agreed to.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, that the House do now adjourn, upon which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

Mr. FINCK. I move that when the House adjourn it adjourn to meet on Friday next.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I demand the yeas and nays on this motion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BROOMALL and FINCK were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported twenty-four in the affirmative.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. NOELL. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FINCK,] by striking out "Friday" and inserting "Thursday" in lieu thereof.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Upon the motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. NOELL and WASHBURN, of Indiana, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported twenty in the affirmative.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 25, nays 68, not voting 98; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Boyer, Campbell, Cooper, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, John H. Hubbard, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Le Blond, Marston, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Patterson, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Spaulding, Taber, and Williams—25.

Ward, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, Whaley, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—98.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No quorum having voted, the question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 29, nays 56, not voting 106; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Anderson, Benjamin, Conkling, Eckley, Farnsworth, Glossbrenner, Hawkins, John H. Hubbard, Humphrey, Hunter, Ingersoll, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Laflin, Marston, McRuer, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Patterson, Samuel J. NAYS—Messrs. Baker, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Boutwell, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ward, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, Whaley, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—106.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] to suspend for the present further proceedings under the call.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared and reported that in pursuance of the warrant of the Speaker he had arrested and now had in custody at the bar of the House Mr. DEFREES, of Indiana.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. DEFREES, you have been absent from the session of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to render for your absence?

Mr. DEFREES. About fifteen minutes after four o'clock in the afternoon I inferred from indications here that the House would soon adjourn, and therefore I left. It was about the usual hour of adjournment, and I knew the House ought to adjourn about that time. I do not know that I have any other excuse.

Mr. ORTH. I move that the gentleman be excused upon the payment of the usual fees.

Mr. SCHENCK. Before the House acts upon that motion, I would like to know of the gentleman, if he will tell me, how he will vote if we let him off in this way. I have noticed this in regard to all the deserters here; after they have been arrested, brought here, discharged, and returned to the ranks, they go against us. That is a trait common to all deserters.

Mr. DEFREES. When my name is called upon any question I will show how I will vote.

Mr. SCHENCK. In the hope that this case will be an exception to the rule, I will not oppose the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ORTH.]

Mr. DRIGGS. Is it in order to move to amend so as to require that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DEFREES] shall be put in the old Capitol until twelve o'clock, so as to secure ourselves from this vote against us?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that such an amendment would not be in order.

The motion of Mr. ORTH was then agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs upon the motion to suspend for the present the proceedings under this call, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. FINCK. I would inquire how many votes were reported on the last call of the roll?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Less than a quorum.

Mr. FINCK. Then I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is one call still pending; the House is now acting under a call. There cannot be two calls of the House at the same time.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, (at fifteen minutes before five o'clock a. m.) Is a motion to adjourn now in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion would be in order.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Then I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and upon a division, there were—yeas 42, nays 53.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. FARNSWORTH called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. SCHENCK. We may as well have the yeas and nays on this question; and I therefore ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 57, nays 58, not voting 76; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, Anderson, Benjamin, Bergen, Boyer, Campbell, Conkling, Cooper, Dawson, Defrees, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Eckley, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Finck, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Hawkins, Hogan, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Hunter, Ingersoll, Julian, Kerr, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Laflin, Le Blond, Marston, McRuer, Miller, Morrill, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Patterson, Samuel J. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Ritter, Rogers, Scofield, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Spaulding, Strouse, Taber, Nelson Taylor, Trimble, Trowbridge, and Whaley—57.

NAYS—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Bidwell, Boutwell, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. So the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. A quorum being now present, the question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. NOELL,] to amend the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINCK] by striking out "Friday" and inserting "Thursday," on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 19, nays 83, not voting 89; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Anderson, Bergen, Cooper, Eldridge, Finck, Goodyear, Humphrey, Kerr, Le Blond, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Taber, and Trimble—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Boutwell, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Boyer, Brandegee, Bromwell, Bundy, Campbell, Chanler, Sidney Clark, Conkling, Culver, Darling, Davis,

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I rise to a privileged question, and move that the House adjourn.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to a question of privilege, which takes precedence of a privileged question. There are certain members here who, by the rule, are not entitled to vote, because the fees due by them as delinquents have not been paid. I know that the Speaker has said there is a presumption, unless it appears to the contrary, that the fees are paid. The rule is distinct that the fees must first be paid before the member can vote. I will say, for instance, I have information from the Sergeant-at-Arms that Mr. FARNSWORTH has not paid his fees; and I move, as a test question, his name be stricken from the roll.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The gentleman cannot prove I have not paid them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair decides that the execution of the order of the House takes precedence of all other business except a motion to adjourn.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the Chair to look at the top of page 37 of the Manual.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to adjourn over is pending and must be first disposed of.

Mr. FINCK. I withdraw that motion.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. All we want is one hour for debate after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms reports he has Mr. WARD, of Kentucky, at the bar.

Mr. FINCK. He was excused from attendance on account of sickness.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Only on the first call.

Mr. TRIMBLE. On both.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not the record at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. WARD, of Kentucky, you have been absent from the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. WARD, of Kentucky. I have been confined to my room for two days past, and only looked into the House for a few minutes last night and found the House was in the highest filibustering mood. I retired on the assurance I had been excused from further attendance.

Mr. FINCK. I move the gentleman be discharged.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL rose.

Mr. SCHENCK. I make a point of order: the gentleman cannot address the Chair, because I have inquired of the Sergeant-at-Arms and learned there has been no adjustment of fees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That cannot be received while the House is in the execution of its own order. The Sergeant-at-Arms has another absentee at the bar.

Mr. BROMWELL, you have been absent from the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. BROMWELL. I stayed here as long as I was able, suffering, as I am and have been, from an injury. I left at half past five and went to my lodgings, thinking the House would soon adjourn. When informed the House was still in session I returned and remained till the last car, when I went home, satisfied if I did not do so the injury might become permanent.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I move the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. SCHENCK. I make this point: until a member pays his fees he cannot address the House or make a motion. Such is the language of the rule. I go further and say the member is presumed not to have paid it till the contrary is shown.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have paid my fees.

Mr. COBB demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. SCHENCK. It may be useful as a record hereafter.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 51, nays 63, not voting 77; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Benjamin, Bergen, Boyer, Campbell, Conkling, Cooper, Dawson, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Eckley, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Hawkins, Hogan, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Hunter, Ingersoll, Julian, Kerr, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Latham, Le Blond, Marston, McKee, Miller, Morrill, Myers, Niblack, Nicholson, Noel, Patterson, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Strouse, Taber, Nelson Taylor, Trimble, Andrew H. Ward, and Whaley—51.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Bidwell, Boutwell, Broomall, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cullom, Deffrees, Delano, Driggs, Eggleston, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Grinnell, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Jencks, Kelso, Koontz, Longyear, Lynch, McClurg, McIndoe, Mercer, Morris, Moulton, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Plants, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Starr, Stokes, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, and Williams—33.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Beaman, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Bundy, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Culver, Darling, Davis, Deming, Denison, Dixon, Dumont, Garfield, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Harris, Henderson, Hise, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Kelley, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Leftwich, Loan, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, Maynard, McCullough, McKee, McRuer, Moorhead, Myers, Noel, Patterson, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Radford, William H. Randall, Raymond, John H. Rice, Rogers, Ross, Rousseau, Scofield, Sloan, Spalding, Stevens, Stillwell, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—77.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. FINCK. I now move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Friday next.

Mr. SCHENCK. Is not that in the nature of business; and can it take precedence of the appeal upon the question of privilege that I took?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is not aware that any appeal is pending.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have certainly attempted to appeal and was recognized once, but somehow the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] got an opportunity to move to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINCK] is in order.

Mr. HIGBY. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] certainly took an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. SCHENCK. The Speaker decided that my question could not be entertained pending the motion to adjourn to a day certain. From that I took an appeal, but about that time the motion to adjourn to a day certain was withdrawn, and then the gentleman from Illinois moved that the House adjourn. My question was, that the gentlemen who had not paid their fines were not entitled to make motions or to vote. I believe that motion is in order now, and I make it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Friday next takes precedence of the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

Mr. FINCK. I demand the yeas and nays on my motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to amend by inserting Thursday instead of Friday, and on that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. McINDOE. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. McINDOE and LE BLOND.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas twenty-six, nays none.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken; it was decided in the negative—yeas 13, nays 63, not voting 105; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Bidwell, Boyer, Campbell, Cooper, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Humphrey, Kerr, Niblack, Nicholson, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Strouse, and Taber—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Baker, Beaman, Benjamin, Bergen, Boutwell, Broomall, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Dawson, Deffrees, Delano, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farquhar, Finck, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Higby, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Jencks, Julian, Kelso, Ketcham, Koontz, Latham, Longyear, Lynch, McClurg, McIndoe, Mercer, Miller, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Price, Alexander H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Shellabarger, Starr, Stokes, Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, and Williams—63.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Bundy, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Culver, Darling, Davis, Deming, Denison, Dixon, Dumont, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hawkins, Henderson, Hill, Hise, Hogan, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, Hulburd, Hunter, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Kelley, Kuykendall, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Leftwich, Loan, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, Maynard, McCullough, McKee, McRuer, Moorhead, Myers, Noel, Patterson, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Radford, William H. Randall, Raymond, John H. Rice, Rogers, Ross, Rousseau, Scofield, Sloan, Spalding, Stevens, Stillwell, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, Whaley, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—105.

So the motion was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. FINCK, that when the House adjourns it adjourn till Friday next; on which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

The question being taken, it was decided in the negative—yeas 11, nays 77, not voting 103; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Boyer, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Hogan, Le Blond, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Sitgreaves, and Andrew H. Ward—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Boutwell, Broomall, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—103.

So the motion was disagreed to.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared and reported that he had, pursuant to the warrant of the Speaker, arrested and now had in custody at the bar of the House Mr. RAYMOND and Mr. POMEROY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. RAYMOND, you have been absent from this House during its session without its leave. What excuse have you to offer for being thus absent?

Mr. RAYMOND. None but fatigue, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the gentleman be excused upon the payment of the usual fees. The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. POMEROY, you have been absent from this House during its session without leave. What excuse have you to offer for being thus absent?

Mr. POMEROY. I went to New York on necessary and important business. I returned to this city by the night train, and seeing the Capitol lighted up, I came up here to see what was to pay.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I hope the Speaker will inform the gentleman that there is the sum of $2 50 to pay. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRIS. I move that the gentleman be excused without the payment of fees.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to suggest to the House that we take a recess till twelve o'clock; or rather to have an understanding that there will be no vote taken till twelve o'clock, but that gentlemen may speak until that time.

Objections were made by several members.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] to strike from the roll the name of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw that motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question next recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] to suspend for the present further proceedings under the call.

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw that motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No other business is now in order but proceedings under the call.

Mr. FINCK, (at ten minutes to seven o'clock a. m.) I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. ORTH. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GRINNELL. I call for tellers upon ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GRINNELL and Mr. NICHOLSON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were no votes in the affirmative and none in the negative.

So tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question recurred upon the motion to adjourn.

Mr. FINCK. I call for tellers on the motion to adjourn.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. MORRIS were appointed. The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—yeas 24, noes 65.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I rise to a privileged question. I would like to be informed by the Chair if there is any regular parliamentary mode by which a member may escape from this Hall. I went without my dinner yesterday and without my supper last night. Now, I would be very happy to be enabled to get my breakfast this morning; and I would like the Chair to inform me where I can find any hole through which I can lawfully escape from this Hall. I desire to be absent just long enough to get a breakfast.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can be excused by a vote of the House, or the House can adopt a motion to suspend all further proceedings under the call.

Mr. HIGBY. I hope the gentleman will not be excused; I never knew him to have so sweet a voice as now, and I think it must do him good to go without eating for a time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The only business now in order is the proceeding under the call.

Mr. SCHENCK. Would it now be in order for me to make a proposition?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would be by unanimous consent.

No objection was made.

Mr. SCHENCK. I propose that for a little while we refuse to suspend proceedings under the call until we have obtained a sufficient number of our members here to enable those on this side of the House to relieve each other so that we may wear out the other side.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. You have been doing that for a long time.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I am only surprised at the magnanimity and generosity of the gentleman; it is more than he ever gave before.

Mr. SCHENCK. I know it is not usual to disclose one's plans to an enemy.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. That is a most remarkable thing.

Mr. NOELL. I rise to a question of privilege. If we are to remain here all day, I suggest that the doors of the galleries had better be opened so that we may have some fresh air.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will be instructed to open the doors of the House.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I desire unanimous consent to say one word. [Cries of "Proceed," "Go ahead," and "Say one word."]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair fears no objection.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, we have remained here engaged in what I may term an idle effort during sixteen hours, only a handful of Representatives contending against nearly fivefold their number. We have stood here for the purpose of demanding a discussion of a bill which you of the majority have said yourselves is most important, and which we, in like manner, consider of the utmost and the gravest importance. This is no less, sir, than a bill to interfere with the practice of the Supreme Court of the United States, and for the discussion of that question so important we have asked you for but one single hour, and we feel that having asked that single hour for the discussion of so important a question we shall not only stand right in our own estimation, but that we shall stand right before the country. The people of this country in no respect and at no time sympathize with the tyrannical majority of a legislative body which seeks to trample upon the rights of the minority and prevent a free discussion of any measure. And now, sir, after sixteen hours' contest we say to you again that we are willing to end this contest and adjourn now, provided you will give us that one hour after the morning hour to-morrow. [Cries of "No, no!" from the Republican side of the House.] Well, sir, it is your privilege again to refuse; it is our duty to ask.

Mr. HIGBY. That offer was made early last evening. [Cries of "No, no!" from the Democratic side of the House.]

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. No, sir, I question that statement. There was never a time during this entire contest, since nine o'clock last evening when this side of the House was not willing to yield for one single hour's discussion.

Mr. HIGBY. Before nine o'clock I rose in my place and made that proposition, and it was objected to.

A VOICE. Objected to on your own side of the House.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I have no such recollection; but if the gentleman acted in good faith last night in making that proposition, what objection can he have to renew it now? What has he to fear from a proper discussion of this bill?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I cannot speak for my friends, but if the gentleman opposite will take an hour now I shall not object.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. We cannot do it after nearly twenty-four hours labor here. We are not physical giants. We are asking nothing but what is right, nothing but what I think gentlemen should award to us. We have been resisting here what we conceive to be a wrong.

Mr. COBB. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know what the question before the House is?

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I am speaking by unanimous consent of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman was allowed to proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. SPALDING. How long does that consent last? Can he speak for an hour?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is entitled to one hour.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Now, sir, how do we stand here?

Mr. RROOMALL. I rise to a question of order. I submit that there is no question before the House upon which the gentleman can speak.

Mr. FINCK. The bill is before the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is proceeding by unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I rose, not for the purpose of aggravating this controversy, but rather with a view to arouse the magnanimity of the majority here. We feel that we can yet hold out much longer, and we mean to hold out; but I ask gentlemen what good will be done by the prolongation of this controversy? Let me say that the responsibility of this scene in the House of Representatives rests solely and entirely with the majority, who have denied to the minority one of the most reasonable requests ever made by a minority in any legislative body—that in the discussion of a question so important as this a single hour should be allowed them for discussion. We have asked for an hour.

Mr. SPALDING. I propose that we give to gentlemen on the other side from this time till twelve o'clock to-day to talk on this subject.

Mr. CONKLING. And that in the mean time the House adjourn. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPALDING. Yes, sir. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. STROUSE. Mr. Speaker, I claim the floor, my colleague, Mr. RANDALL, having yielded to me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's colleague had surrendered the floor, and the gentleman can proceed only by unanimous consent.

Mr. PAINE. I object.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire to submit a proposition which I think will satisfy both sides of the House.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I object to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] speaking for the majority of this House. He is a traitor. [Laughter.] Of course I mean this in a Pickwickian sense.

Mr. FINCK. I rise to a point of order. I wish to know whether it is parliamentary for a member on this floor to call a brother member a traitor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair it is not.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I meant the remark in a Pickwickian sense, as a matter of course.

Mr. MORRIS. I wish to make a suggestion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can do so only by unanimous consent.

There was no objection.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Speaker, the majority of this House have denied the minority a hearing. A short time since the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] who had the floor, yielded it, to my certain knowledge, to his colleague, [Mr. STROUSE.] It strikes me that the Speaker ought to have recognized the latter gentleman rather than any gentleman on the other side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MORRIS] is not correct as to the matter of fact. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] who first addressed the Chair had the unanimous consent of the House to proceed and would have been entitled to an hour if he had chosen to occupy it, or to yield it to any other gentleman. He, however, ceased speaking, surrendered the floor, and in the mean time the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] addressed the Chair and was recognized. This was some time before the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STROUSE] addressed the Chair. Hence the gentleman from New York [Mr. MORRIS] is mistaken in reference to the fact.

Mr. WHALEY. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution. I ask that it be read for information.

Mr. STROUSE and others objected.

Mr. HIGBY and Mr. SPALDING called for the regular order.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. COBB. I rise to a point of order. Is all this debate supposed to be indulged in by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. COBB. Then I object to any further debate until there shall be some debatable question before the House.

Mr. INGERSOLL, (at half past seven o'clock a. m.) I wish to submit a motion to adjourn, or rather to take a recess.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask that I may be heard for a few moments.

Mr. HIGBY. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER, pro tempore. Objection being made, no debate is in order; nor would a motion for a recess be in order. A motion to adjourn would be in order.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If the House would take a recess—

Several MEMBERS. Order!

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move that all further proceedings under the call of the House be dispensed with.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. STROUSE, (at twenty-five minutes to eight o'clock a. m.) I now move in good faith that the House adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. Speaker, I have understood from the beginning of our trouble that it has not arisen from any indisposition on the part of the majority to give the minority an hour or more for the discussion of this bill, but is owing to this fact: that in giving that hour it would deprive the Judiciary Committee of all the time they will have at this session to report to the House and have acted on the supremely important matters referred to that committee, and thus deprive the country of most vital legislation.

Mr. STROUSE. Such, for instance, as the impeachment of the President.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I ask whether there is any way by which it can be arranged that gentlemen on the other side shall have an hour or more for debate, which I exceedingly desire they shall have, and yet not deprive the Judiciary Committee of the time allotted to it for making reports?

Mr. LE BLOND. That can be remedied by giving consent that they shall have an additional hour in which to make their reports.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I consent to that, and think it a reasonable proposition.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will make a suggestion to the House, and especially to gentlemen on this side. I have been as anxious as anybody to prosecute the public business, and in any part I have had in this matter I have had no purpose except to promote business under the rules of the House. We are in this difficulty. I do not say whether I am more to blame or other people; but I am willing to take the responsibility for this affair, having charge of the bill from the Committee on the Judiciary.

I think, sir, it will be wise, looking to the prosecution of public business, if we shall disregard for a moment the question whether the fault lies with this or the other side for our present trouble; and I make the suggestion that we take a recess until eleven o'clock, and that from eleven to twelve o'clock be given to the other side for debate, with the understanding that no dilatory motions are to be made.

Mr. DAWSON. That is right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will respond to the gentleman from Massachusetts. By the rules of the House each committee is entitled to two morning hours. The Judiciary Committee has already had one morning hour and is entitled to another, and this being the short session that committee will not be again reached in all probability for reports of a public nature. If the House adjourns the pending subject will come up after the reading of the Journal. By unanimous consent, the House can adopt the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts or grant an additional morning hour to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LE BLOND. I want to meet the gentleman from Massachusetts with the same liberality and desire to consult the public interest which he has just now shown. The gentleman will see it is now nearly eight o'clock, and by the time we get our breakfast and return here it will be after eleven o'clock. I believe every member on this side will agree to extend to that committee an additional hour in which to make their reports.

Mr. SCHENCK. That would put back all other committees.

Mr. LE BLOND. I know some gentlemen on this side who desire to speak. I do not myself. I believe it is fair and right that they should be heard. This will obviate the whole difficulty, and when the hour expires the gentleman can have a vote on the bill, and that will end the controversy.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The difficulty is this: if the Judiciary Committee be allowed another hour it will set back the other committees which are to follow that committee and are ready with their reports. If gentlemen will subject themselves to a little inconvenience this morning and come here at eleven o'clock, we can go on.

Mr. LE BLOND. We can prolong our session. For one I am willing to meet of nights, and I believe the minority is also willing in order to make up this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts to be that the House take a recess till eleven o'clock, that from eleven to twelve be devoted to debate, and that at twelve the vote shall be taken.

Mr. FINCK. I suggest that we take a recess until half past eleven o'clock.

Mr. SCHENCK. I wish to say that it seems to me a little too late to go back now on what has been done. This bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary under circumstances which have been fully explained to the House, and which are well understood. Propositions were made, and there was no agreement under the lead of the Judiciary Committee representing the majority on this floor. We have labored here for hours against a minority which has been, if not factious, at least very obstinate in its determination that the majority shall not have its way, until now we have advanced into another day. Is it necessary that we should now wait till eleven or half past eleven o'clock, or accept any other terms that may be dictated to us by that minority, and ought we to do it? There are in this city a sufficient number of members agreeing with us in opinion constituting a majority of this House, and who have the responsibility of its legislation, who can be brought here within the next hour or so, and I am willing to wait for them to come here and pass this bill over the heads of any such minority.

Mr. FINCK, Mr. LE BLOND, and others. You cannot do it; you will not pass this bill to-day.

Mr. SCHENCK. Well, I am willing to test the question who shall make terms; who shall dictate and who shall control us.

Mr. LE BLOND. When my colleague fails in parliamentary tactics to accomplish his end, what does he mean to do then?

Mr. SCHENCK. Ah, I have seen this thing before.

Mr. LE BLOND. I would like my colleague to answer this question: if he fails in parliamentary tactics to get a vote on this bill, by what means does he expect to get that vote?

Mr. SCHENCK. It is very possible we may be able to get a vote by continuing in our places here.

Mr. SPALDING. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the call for the regular order of business interrupts this debate, and the Chair will again put the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] to the House.

Mr. GOBB. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to yield to me a moment.

Mr. SPALDING. I object to any further discussion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts proposes that the House now take a recess till eleven o'clock a. m.; and that from eleven o'clock till twelve be devoted to debate upon this bill. Is there objection to the proposition?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

Mr. DAWSON. I think the proposition made by the gentleman from Massachusetts is a reasonable one and should be accepted, and I trust there will be no objection to it on this side of the House. I renew his proposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAWSON] renews the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts. Is there objection to it? The Chair hears no objection, and the House now takes a recess until eleven o'clock.

Accordingly (at a quarter before eight o'clock a. m.) the House took a recess till eleven o'clock a. m.

AFTER THE RECESS.

The House reassembled at eleven o'clock a. m.

The SPEAKER. By an order of the House, adopted by unanimous consent before the recess, one hour is now to be devoted to debate upon the pending bill (H. R. No. 289) to prescribe an oath for public officers and members of the bar, and for other purposes.

Mr. FINCK. Mr. Speaker, the scene which has transpired in this House during its late session, occupying nearly twenty continuous hours, exhibits to the country and to the members of the House the fact that it is unwise for the majority to be illiberal or domineering to the minority in all legislative assemblies. If the gentleman in charge of this bill had been liberal enough to have allowed to this side of the House a reasonable time for discussion on yesterday, the scenes which we have witnessed during the night and morning, would not have been enacted in this Hall. This bill would have been disposed of. We should have had our usual sleep last night, and come here fresh this morning to discharge our duties.

Mr. Speaker, what is this bill? It is a bill introduced from the Committee on the Judiciary, one of a series of measures intended to invade the just jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States and to subvert its just powers. This bill has not been printed; it was brought for the first time to the attention of the House on yesterday. From the moment of its introduction almost up to this time we have been employed in giving our attention to the session of this House, and so much so that I have been prevented by the labors of the session from making the preparation which is necessary in order to enable me to present my objections against this bill in such manner as I would desire.

This bill in my judgment seeks to avoid and set aside the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States respecting the test oath as applied to attorneys and counselors of law in the courts of the United States. It seeks to do that indirectly which by the decision of the Supreme Court cannot be done directly. It seeks to deprive men who are now in the exercise and enjoyment of the right to practice in the courts of the United States from the exercise of that right. This bill, if it shall be enacted into a law, will be ex post facto in its operations.

What are the provisions of this bill? It provides that no person shall be permitted to act as attorney or counselor in any court of the United States who has been guilty of treason, bribery, murder, or other felony, or who has been engaged in rebellion against the Government of the United States, or who has given aid, comfort, or encouragement to the enemies of the United States in armed hostility thereto. The provisions of this bill relating to "bribery, murder, or other felony" are inserted for the purpose of covering the real intent and object of the bill. Its real purpose is doubtless to prevent men who have in any way encouraged the rebellion against the Government of the United States, or held office in the civil or military service of the so-called confederate States, or given it aid and comfort in any manner, from practicing in the courts of the United States.

Now, in my opinion, you cannot in this way prevent a man who has been admitted to practice in the courts of the United States from the exercise and enjoyment of the rights of his profession in these courts. Take the case of ex parte Garland, where the direct question was presented. Mr. Garland had held some office in the confederate States and could not therefore take the test oath. He had before that time been admitted as an attorney in the Supreme Court of the United States. After the termination of the rebellion, or perhaps during its existence, he had been pardoned by the President of the United States from any crime of which he may have been guilty in aiding the rebellion. He presented himself before the Supreme Court and asked to be allowed to practice in that court without taking the oath referred to. He was met by this oath provided by the law of 1865, the "test oath" as it is called, as applied to attorneys in United States courts. He and his counsel argued that that act was unconstitutional; that it sought to deprive him of the exercise of a right to which he was entitled by reason of having prior to that time been admitted to practice in the courts of the United States; and the court, on full argument and careful consideration, held, very properly, I think, that that oath was unconstitutional, that it was ex post facto in its operation, and sought to deprive a man of the enjoyment of the fruits of his profession as an attorney in that court.

Mr. Speaker, this is not an act proposing to operate only in the future; but it operates upon persons who already are practitioners in that court; and it seeks to deprive them of the exercise of a right which belongs to the profession. The position of attorney or counselor is, it is true, considered as an officer of the court, but it is not such a political office as our laws recognize. Attorneys and counselors of law are officers designated by the courts to aid them in the administration of justice. They are the agents of the clients whose interests are brought into these courts, for the purpose of properly presenting them for adjudication.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] in adverting to the Supreme Court of the United States, said that if there were five judges in the highest tribunal of the land who had not sufficient self-respect to enact rules and enforce regulations, that would protect themselves from the foul contamination of conspirators and traitors, it was the duty of the legislative branch of the Government to do it for them. Now, with all deference to the gentleman from Massachusetts, I think the Supreme Court is just as competent to protect itself and, maintain its self-respect, as is the gentleman from Massachusetts or the members of this body.

Let me here advert to a consideration which

I may not be able to take up so appropriately under any other branch of the argument. Political offenses have never been regarded in the same light as the offenses of murder, bribery, &c., named in this bill. They have been recognized by every one as constituting a different class of offenses. Why, sir, it will be remembered by you and by the members of this House that no longer than twelve or thirteen years ago this Government sent across the ocean a vessel of the United States, and was instrumental in procuring the release of Louis Kossuth from a prison in Turkey, brought him to the United States, and made him the guest of the nation. What had Kossuth done? He had tried to establish the independence of Hungary. He failed; and according to the laws of Austria he was liable to be arrested, tried, and convicted for treason. Yet he was received with the warmest demonstrations by the American people. But the majority of this House now seek to treat the people of the South, who are our countrymen, as public enemies, and deny to them the rights of citizens. Political offenses of the character referred to are not considered as affecting the moral character of the offender. Why, sir, let me put a case, and in referring to it I trust I shall not be considered as departing from the legitimate line of debate. There is a distinguished gentleman of the State of Massachusetts, who has been elected to the Fortieth Congress as the successor of the gentleman [Mr. ALLEY] who is now the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. This gentleman is a distinguished member of the bar, practicing in the Supreme Court of the United States. Now, sir, I say that in my deliberate judgment three fourths of the lawyers of this country who have any distinction at the bar, and are looked upon as eminent in their profession, would prefer to appear in court as the professional associates of Alexander H. Stephens rather than with the gentleman to whom I refer.

Sir, does the gentleman really desire to protect this great court from contamination? Why does he not go further? If he proposes to take under his control and supervision the character of this august tribunal, he might extend his benevolent and patriotic efforts somewhat further. I understand that at a public reception given in this city not more than a year ago by a man whose talents and energy, more perhaps than that of any other person, aided in bringing about the suppression of the rebellion—I mean General Grant—Alexander H. Stephens was an invited guest; and men on this floor, of both sides of the House, if I am not mistaken, were in attendance and took Mr. Stephens by the hand. Were these men contaminated? Was General Grant contaminated? Did he lose his position and standing as a patriotic and devoted citizen? No, sir; like a brave and gallant soldier he understands how noble it is to be generous and magnanimous to a defeated people who are a portion of our countrymen. A great and brave nation will always be generous to a fallen foe.

Mr. Speaker, I do not make these comparisons for the purpose of exciting any bitter feeling. I merely advert to them for the purpose of showing that, in the estimation of the world and of Christian civilization, men who have been engaged in efforts to throw off the control of one Government and establish a new one, are not to be regarded in the same light with men who have been guilty of bribery, murder, or other high crimes. There always has been recognized a distinction between such crimes and political offenses.

But why should not these men practice in the courts of the United States? The laws of the several States require the applicant to be a man of good moral character. You are not satisfied with such a rule as that. You propose to go much further. You now propose to pass a law the like of which we have never seen before, either in State or Federal legislation. The specification of bribery, murder, or other felony embraced in this bill is only used for the purpose of covering up a design to prevent the citizens of the southern States from practicing in the courts of the United States. You have shut the door against their representatives. You also propose to shut the door against those men in the South who may be elected to vote for President and Vice President. That is not fully up to the demands of aggressive radicalism, and we are to have this proposed legislation, and more in the same direction. I say that it is a part of that system of legislation so common here, which seems to have been conceived in a spirit of revenge and malignity.

Mr. Speaker, the men who organized the rebellion no doubt have been guilty of a great crime. That, however, is a question which is to be determined by the courts in the method provided for in the Constitution. I have always denounced secession. I denounce it now. It was a great and fatal mistake on the part of the people of the States who went into the rebellion. It was a crime. But, sir, do you believe that seven or eight million people like ourselves, loving free government as we do, could have been inspired to take part in a common cause, to organize a government of their own unless they had confidence in the cause which they espoused? You say they were wrong. I know they were wrong. I have always denounced the attempt to disrupt the union of these States. But I say that there was a belief existing in the minds of a great portion of the people of the southern States that a State had a right to secede from the Union; and I say, moreover, and charge it here without fear of contradiction, that leading men of the Republican party at the North encouraged this idea and encouraged the right of the southern States to withdraw from the Union. I suppose many of these people did really believe that they had a right to secede. You cannot look into the hearts of men and ascertain their belief. Sir, if they did in good faith believe in the right of secession the very essence of crime is absent, namely, the intention to commit it. They have, however, violated the Constitution and laws of the United States, but you do not propose to punish the entire people of the South. The most unbounded malignity would hardly be equal to that. Your legislation shows that during the war you passed an act sanctioning the executive use of the pardoning power. He has issued pardons to almost the entire people of the southern States. In this he has acted like a wise and patriotic Chief Magistrate.

Now, what is the effect of these pardons? Not only to relieve the party from punishment; not only, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania said last year, to take away the penalty and punishment of the crime; but, in the language of the books—and there is no conflict about it—to restore the pardoned man to the same position that he would have occupied had he never committed the offense. This is the law as plainly shown in both the English and American authorities. Blackstone says:

"A pardon may be pleaded in bar as at once destroying the end and purpose of the indictment, by remitting the punishment which the prosecution is calculated to inflict. The effect of such a pardon by the king is to make the offender a new man; to acquit him of all corporal punishment and forfeitures annexed to that offense for which he obtains his pardon."

This power of pardoning by the President, as has very justly been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, may be exercised before the trial and conviction or after such trial and conviction. The pardoning power is an executive power; it is a plenary power, restricted only by certain limitations fixed by the Constitution of the United States itself. But you seek by your legislation to utterly ignore the effect of these pardons.

Take the case of a citizen of the State of North Carolina—a citizen of that State, and a lawyer practicing his profession. He did not aid in originating the rebellion; but in the progress of the war he may have accepted some civil or military office of the so-called confederate States. The rebellion was overthrown, and those States have again become entitled to have their practical relations with the Federal Government fully restored. Their citizens always were and to-day continue to be citizens of the United States. Is that man who has been pardoned, whose character is pure and unblemished, except that he may have held some office under one of the States of the so-called confederacy, to be deprived and his family deprived of his just earnings in the courts of the United States?

Sir, I cannot dwell upon this point, for I do not desire to trespass long upon the attention of the House. But it seems to me that this legislation was conceived in a spirit of hostility to the people of the South. Who are these people of the South? They are the sons and daughters, and the children of the sons and daughters of the men who fought side by side with our fathers to achieve our independence and establish our Government. They are our brethren. You and I and our children who are to come after us for generations are to live with these people under a common Government, and unite in fidelity and support to the Constitution of the United States. Is it the part of wisdom for us to interpose obstacles to those friendly relations which ought to exist between all the citizens of the States?

Mr. Speaker, one or two other words and I will have said all I intend to say on this subject. I do not say it out of any disrespect personally to any gentleman upon this floor, but I say it nevertheless as my deliberate judgment, that the principles of the party in power and to-day controlling the legislative department of the Government are not in conformity with the principles of our Constitution and frame of Government; and in order that they may successfully establish the principles for which they are contending to-day they are compelled to change our Constitution and to invade the just jurisdiction and prerogatives of the executive and judiciary.

That is the reason why we find these measures trenching upon these different departments of the Government. Sir, a free Government like this can only be maintained by maintaining the just powers of each department of the Government. The great danger is to-day, as it has always been, that this, the more popular branch of the Government, will invade and usurp the rights which belong to the other departments of the Government. You see these things already in the proposed measures in this House. That august tribunal to whom the people have always looked with reverence and respect and confidence; that tribunal which is to decide as the last resort the great controversies growing out of our system of Government between the States and the people of the different States, and to construe and apply the great principles of our Government; that supreme tribunal is attacked, and why? Because it has been faithful while others have been faithless; because it has had the manhood and independence to rise above mere partisanship and to vindicate the great principles of the Constitution of our fathers. I trust that the Supreme Court will not be invaded by the proposed legislation of Congress. I trust it will be left as it was organized by our fathers, to exercise the jurisdiction and powers conferred upon it by the Constitution and laws of the United States. I believe while that court does exercise and discharge these duties faithfully, if this bill be passed, it will hold, as it held in reference to the test-oath, that it is unconstitutional.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, in the remarks I intend to submit to the House upon this important question I shall confine myself to the legal proposition involved. I know, as has been well remarked by the honorable gentleman who has just taken his seat, we have gone through a scene of great excitement to get our rights to be heard, and sir, I know the frailties of human nature are such that all of us say many things in the heat of extempore debate we would not say upon mature reflection.

And let me say, however much we may be excited in the heat of debate, and however much we may desire to be heard, or whatever we may say for the purpose of what we believe, we say it in no disrespect to any person who disagrees with us politically on the other side of the House. We ask no more in reference to propositions before the House than that a reasonable time will be allowed to the members on each side to discuss a question so new and important in its character for a limited period.

This bill cannot be legally passed by us for three reasons. First, there is no authority given by the Constitution for the legislative branch of this Government to interfere with the executive or the judicial branches; for when our fathers framed the Government, they so constituted it that it should consist of three separate and distinct jurisdictions and powers, to place the checks and balances in such equipoise that there would be no infringement of one by the other.

The three objections to which this bill is liable are: first, it is an ex post facto law; second, it is a bill of attainder; and third, it deprives the citizen in the investigation of his case of the estimable right of trial by a jury, a right descended to us from Magna Charta of England, sacred to every American as the palladium of our liberties.

This bill proposes to punish—because it is nothing more nor less than punishment—by preventing a person from exercising a calling which he had a legitimate right to follow at the time the offense was committed, for being engaged in armed hostility to the United States or for other acts named, unless the penalty attached to the offender at the time they were committed, cannot be now used as an excuse for adding to the punishment thus provided for. The Supreme Court of the United States, in two cases in which that question was presented, have just clearly and unequivocally decided and demonstrated that such an act is unconstitutional. In the cases to which I refer the court go into a thorough investigation of the question of ex post facto law and bill of attainder, and they decide that the refusal to take the test oath by a person who was engaged in armed rebellion and was a member of the legislative branch of the confederate government during the time that the rebellion was going on in the South, could not exclude him from the exercise of his calling as attorney or counselor, upon the simple ground, plainly stated, that it was inflicting upon him a new punishment by depriving him of a right, taking from him a privilege which had been lodged in him by the Constitution and laws of his country. The court, in the case of ex parte Garland, say:

"The statute is directed against parties who have offended in any of the particulars embraced by these clauses. And its object is to exclude them from the profession of the law, or at least from its practice in the courts of the United States. As the oath prescribed cannot be taken by these parties, the act, as against them, operates as a legislative decree of perpetual exclusion. And exclusion from any of the professions or any of the ordinary avocations of life for past conduct can be regarded in no other light than as punishment for such conduct. The exaction of the oath is the mode provided for ascertaining the parties upon whom the act is intended to operate, and instead of lessening, increases its objectionable character. All enactments of this kind partake of the nature of bills of pains and penalties, and are subject to the constitutional inhibition against the passage of bills of attainder, under which general designation they are included.

"In the exclusion which the statute adjudges it imposes a punishment for some of the acts specified which were not punishable, or may not have been punishable at the time they were committed; and for other of the acts it adds a new punishment to that then prescribed, and it is thus brought within the further inhibition of the Constitution against the passage of an ex post facto law. In the case of Cummings against The State of Missouri, just decided, we have had occasion to consider at length the meaning of a bill of attainder and of an ex post facto law in the clauses of the Constitution forbidding their passage by the States, and it is unnecessary to repeat here what we there said. A like prohibition is contained in the Constitution against enactments of this kind by Congress; and the argument presented in that case against certain clauses of the constitution of Missouri is equally applicable to the act of Congress under consideration in this case."

An attorney or counselor is not an officer of the United States. It is not an office created by act of Congress which continues its powers upon the will of its creator. Attorneys and counselors are not appointed in the manner prescribed by the Constitution for the election and appointment of officers. They are officers of the court, admitted as such by its order. Their admission and removal are judicial acts, and such acts cannot be controlled by Congress without the destruction of that branch of the Government. (Ex parte Garland, page 93.)

Will anybody in this House dispute the proposition that this is a punishment for the offense which is laid down in the bill, of which offense it claims the persons who may make application, or who have already made application, have been guilty. It deprives them of the exercise of a profession and business which may be their sole dependence, because many men have nothing but their legal practice to depend upon for subsistence. It would therefore be a punishment of a most serious character, indeed much more so to many than a mere fine that might be imposed by a court or even confinement in a jail upon indictment and conviction.

There is another ground on which this act is objectionable. It is a bill of attainder, because it assumes to pronounce upon the guilt of the person making application to be admitted to practice without judicial trial. What is a bill of attainder? It is nothing more nor less than the conviction of a party without the ordinary form of judicial trial which the Constitution of the United States has thrown around him as security for his life, property, and personal liberty. This bill, I say, lodges in the court the right to convict a man and to remove him from office for the high crime of felony, treason, or other offense, as stated in this bill, without allowing him the right of trial by a jury of his countrymen to have the question of his guilt or innocence fairly and legitimately passed upon. Now, sir, the Supreme Court has, in the Missouri case, decided that the test oath in Missouri is unconstitutional, because it allows a man to be convicted upon his own testimony, upon testimony unknown to the common law, upon testimony unknown to republicanism and liberty, upon testimony not to be submitted to a jury, but to be submitted merely to those holding the power by the bill to decide upon the guilt or innocence of the party.

The court says, in this Garland case:

"The attorney and counselor being, by the solemn judicial act of the court, clothed with his office, does not hold it as a matter of grace and favor. The right which it confers upon him to appear for suitors, and to argue causes, is something more than a mere indulgence, revocable at the pleasure of the court, or at the command of the Legislature. It is a right of which he can only be deprived by the judgment of the court for moral or professional delinquency.

"The Legislature may undoubtedly prescribe qualifications for the office, with which he must conform, as it may, where it has exclusive jurisdiction, prescribe qualifications for the pursuit of any of the ordinary avocations of life. But to constitute a qualification the condition or thing prescribed must be attainable in theory, at least, by every one. That which from the nature of things, or the past condition or conduct of the parties, cannot be attained by every citizen, does not fall within the definition of the term. To all those by whom it is unattainable it is a disqualification which operates as a perpetual bar to the office. The question in this case is not as to the power of Congress to prescribe qualifications, but whether that power has been exercised as a means for the infliction of punishment, against the prohibition of the Constitution. That this result cannot be effected indirectly by a State under the form of creating qualifications we have held in the case of Cummings vs. The State of Missouri; and the reasoning by which that conclusion was reached applies equally to similar action on the part of Congress."

In the case of Cummings, lately decided by the United States Supreme Court, the court say:

"No State shall pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts."

"A bill of attainder is a legislative act which inflicts punishment without a judicial trial.

"If the punishment be less than death the act is termed a bill of pains and penalties. Within the meaning of the Constitution bills of attainder include bills of pains and penalties. In these cases the legislative body, in addition to its legitimate functions, exercises the powers and office of judge; it assumes, in the language of the text-books, judicial magistracy; it pronounces upon the guilt of the party without any of the forms or safeguards of trial; it determines the sufficiency of the proofs produced, whether conformable to the rules of evidence or otherwise; and it fixes the degree of punishment in accordance with its own notions of the enormity of the offense.

"Bills of this sort," says Mr. Justice Story, "have been most usually passed in England in times of rebellion, or gross subversion to the Crown, or of violent political excitement—periods in which all nations are most liable (as well the free as the enslaved) to forget their duties, and to trample upon the rights and liberties of others."—Commentaries, section 1,344.

"The purpose of the law-maker in the case supposed would be openly avowed; in the case existing it is only disguised. The legal result must be the same, for what cannot be done directly cannot be done indirectly. The Constitution deals with substance, not shadows. Its inhibition was leveled at the thing, not the name. It intended that the rights of the citizen should be secure against deprivation for past conduct by legislative enactment, under any form, however disguised. If the inhibition can be evaded by the form of the enactment, its insertion in the fundamental law was a vain and futile proceeding.

"We proceed to consider the second clause of what Mr. Chief Justice Marshall terms a bill of rights for the people of each State—the clause which inhibits the passage of an ex post facto law.

"By an ex post facto law is meant one which imposes a punishment for an act which was not punishable at the time it was committed, or imposes additional punishment to that then prescribed, or changes the rules of evidence, by which less or different testimony is sufficient to convict than was then required."

"The objectionable character of these clauses will be more apparent if we put them into the ordinary form of a legislative act. Thus, if instead of the general provisions in the constitution the convention had provided as follows: Be it enacted, That all persons who have been in armed hostility to the United States shall, upon conviction thereof, not only be punished as the laws provided at the time the offenses charged were committed, but shall also be thereafter rendered incapable of holding any of the offices, trusts, and positions, and of exercising any of the pursuits mentioned in the third article of the constitution of Missouri, no one would have any doubt of the nature of the enactment. It would be an ex post facto law, and void; for it would add a new punishment for an old offense."

And, sir, I deny the right of any tribunal of this country to degrade and break down a man's character and reputation, destroying his prospects for future happiness, by convicting him of a high crime like murder or treason, without allowing him to have his liberty, his reputation, and his life submitted to that tribunal which the Constitution has ordained, as the Magna Charta of England did, to decide upon the guilt or innocence of the party.

As I before said, this bill is unconstitutional upon another ground: upon the ground that these people who have been pardoned, either by general amnesty or by special grant, have had their guilt entirely wiped out. And from the earliest period of English jurisprudence down to this time the courts have gone so far as to decide that even to call a man who has been engaged in rebellion a "traitor" after he has been pardoned, either by general amnesty or by special act, would be an actionable offense.

The court in this case of Garland go over the ground of the power of the President to pardon. They say:

"The Constitution provides that the President shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment."—Article 2, section 2.

"The power thus conferred is unlimited, with the exception stated. It extends to every offense known to the law, and may be exercised at any time after its commission, either before legal proceedings are taken, or during their pendency, or after conviction and judgment. This power of the President is not subject to legislative control. Congress can neither limit the effect of his pardon or exclude from its exercise any class of offenders. The benign prerogative of mercy reposed in him cannot be fettered by any legislative restrictions.

"Such being the case, the inquiry arises as to the effect and operation of a pardon, and on this point all the authorities concur. A pardon reaches both the punishment prescribed for the offense and the guilt of the offender; and when the pardon is full it releases the punishment and blots out of existence the guilt, so that in the eye of the law the offender is as innocent as if he had never committed the offense. If granted before conviction it prevents any of the penalties and disabilities consequent upon conviction from attaching; if granted after conviction it removes the penalties and disabilities and restores him to all his civil rights: it makes him, as it were, a new man, and gives him a new credit and capacity.

"There is only this limitation to its operation: it does not restore offices forfeited, or property or interests vested in others in consequence of the conviction and judgment. (4 Blackstone, 302; 6 Bacon Abridg., Tit. Pardon; Hawkins, Book 2, ch. 37, secs. 34 and 54.)

"The pardon produced by the petitioner is a full pardon for all offenses by him committed arising from participation, direct or implied, in the rebellion, and is subject to certain conditions which have been complied with. The effect of this pardon is to relieve the petitioner from all penalties and disabilities attached to the offense of treason, committed by his participation in the rebellion. So far as that offense is concerned he is thus placed beyond the reach of punishment of any kind. But to exclude him, by reason of that offense, from continuing in the enjoyment of a previously acquired right is to enforce a punishment for that offense, notwithstanding the pardon. If such exclusion can be effected by the exaction of an expurgatory oath covering the offense, the pardon may be avoided, and that accomplished indirectly which cannot be reached by direct legislation. It is not within the constitutional power of Congress thus to inflict punishment beyond the reach of executive clemency."

Are gentlemen to pay no respect to the decisions of the Supreme Court? Do they want to ride over what seems to be the only star left to guide the downtrodden people of this country to a safe and secure resting place of liberty? When the Supreme Court is stricken down, when that tribunal cannot in an impartial manner exercise the constitutional functions imposed upon it, then liberty can no longer live here, and we shall lose that Constitution and Government which our fathers made and cemented by their blood, and those principles which they laid down as the guarantees and safeguards of our liberties will be dead and gone. We know, as was well said by the court, that in times of excitement and passion reason appears to have flown and common sense to have gone, and nothing but partisan passion, usurpation, and despotism to take their place. But in these times, the only security which the citizens of this country can have for themselves, their property, and their families is by appealing to this august tribunal, which is unfettered by partisan feelings in its decisions, given in a legitimate and constitutional manner, to protect and defend them from impending ruin.

As a matter of policy the precedent which has been established for the courts of this country to admit such persons to practice in them as they please, should be continued, for it is older than the memory of man. You may look back through the jurisprudence of England in her darkest and her brightest days, before and after the Restoration, trace the course of our own system of jurisprudence down to this day, go back for a thousand years, and it will not be found that the attempt was ever made by legislation to deprive a court of the right which is necessary to enable it to exercise its proper power of appointing those persons who are to act as the attorneys and counselors of parties who have writs for its decision.

Why, then, at this time undertake to interfere with this right of the courts? Why not submit these constitutional questions to the Supreme Court of the United States? What has that court done to merit the punishment thus proposed to be inflicted upon them? Why should they be held up before the eyes of the civilized world as traitors and disunionists? The justice who delivered the two able opinions I have quoted was the appointee of the illustrious Lincoln, whose memory is revered by you all, was a native of Illinois, and never was the resident of any insurgent State. He is a true man—one who loves the Constitution of his country. He and a majority of that court are determined to stand by and sustain the immortal principles of fundamental jurisprudence and the organic law, which provide the only safeguards for human liberty.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to say to the gentleman that Judge Davis is one of the minority of the court in the Garland case.

Mr. ROGERS. I referred to the judge who delivered the opinion, Judge Field. He was an appointee of President Lincoln, and never was a resident or citizen of any rebel State. He has been always a loyal and true man. There can be no charge against him of conniving with the rebels for the purpose of giving them an opportunity to destroy his country. There is more danger of the destruction of this Government by such a movement as is going on here than there was at any time during the hottest contest we had during the rebellion.

Do gentlemen recollect how the liberties of Rome and Greece were destroyed? Do they recollect how the liberties of many other countries for the last five or six hundred years were destroyed and overthrown? It was done by just such wild and revolutionary movements as are going on here. If we will only stand by and adhere to the system upon which our Government is founded our country will again become the first among the nations of the earth, and then the flag which now is spread above the Speaker's chair will wave in triumph over this degenerate race from one end of the country to the other, and we will become the wonder of the civilized world. The grandeur, greatness, and glory of this country will never again be established until we come back to the principles established by our fathers.

I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK.]

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Speaker, I will not detain the House for any length of time. As has been well said, this is a most extraordinary measure, one which calls for at least some resistance from those who regard it as I do this or any other similar legislation. In my judgment it is unnecessary, because the present condition of the country does not require it. I can see nothing in the past judicial history of this country, or of the courts of the United States, which calls for such legislation as this—nothing which demands the censure which is implied by the bill which I suppose will soon be passed by this body.

Sir, the judicial branch of this Government is one to which we have all looked with peculiar pride. In no court or system of courts has justice been administered more impartially; nowhere have the proprieties of professional and official life been more steadily observed than in the courts of the United States. Hence it is unjust to those courts to anticipate that they intend to do anything violative of the strictest rules of official and professional etiquette. The class of lawyers who practice in those courts compare favorably with those practicing at any bar in the country, and I may say the world. This bill, however, assumes that the courts of the United States are about to admit to practice a class of men who are unworthy to be the associates of those who are now practicing there; and it seeks by this sort of legislation to override the independence of the judiciary, to aim a blow at the pardoning power of the President, to subvert all the well-settled legal rules which have regulated the admission of attorneys so long as those courts and the courts after which they are modeled have had an existence.

But, sir, the method of reaching the end proposed is highly objectionable, if not impracticable. The mode in which the guilt of parties charged with offenses is to be ascertained raises a side issue, which a court cannot properly try. It is proposed to convict men of crime in a manner unknown to the law. The opinion is entertained by many high in authority in this country, and is held by a number of the gentlemen on the other side of the House, that no man who was connected with the late rebellion can be convicted of treason if he was in the army of the confederate States and recognized as a belligerent. I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] in an argument the other day, to admit, or rather to charge, that Jefferson Davis, the late president of the so-called confederate States, would not be convicted of treason in a civil court, for the reason that he was a belligerent and is now a prisoner of war, liable to be treated only as a prisoner of war by civilized nations. If this doctrine be true, he cannot be held by a civil court to be guilty of treason; and being a prisoner of war, he may, by many means known to the usages of civilized warfare, be incorporated into the body-politic and become entitled to all the rights and privileges in the courts or elsewhere of any other citizen of the United States.

If this doctrine as to the legal liability of those who were engaged in the late rebellion be correct—a question about which I express no opinion on this question, because it would not be germane to this discussion—the bill would be inoperative upon the very class of men whom it confessedly seeks to exclude from practice in the Federal courts. Before we attempt to legislate further upon the question of what is treason and what is not treason, making this offense the ground of exclusion from civil or professional privileges, let us have some decision of the courts upon this question of treason, and the legal guilt of those who have been engaged in the late rebellion, according to the ordinary definitions of the term "treason."

But, sir, the great and insuperable objections I have to the proposed bill are that it is an attempted encroachment on the judicial department of this Government; a blow at the independence of the judiciary of the United States; an attack on constitutional liberty itself. As one who has occupied a brief but humble judicial position, as an American citizen, as a Representative of a portion of the people of this country at least, I protest against the passage of this bill, and shall continue to protest against all such legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to discuss this bill further, but I have already consumed the very short time allotted to me, and I yield the floor.

Mr. KERR. I ask leave to print some remarks upon this bill, but which I will not take up the time of the House by making now.

No objection was made, and leave was accordingly granted. [His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. BOYER took the floor.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to me to move that the House adjourn, so as to have another legislative day.

Mr. BOYER. I yield for that purpose.

The motion was agreed to.

And thereupon (at eleven o'clock and fifty-eight minutes a. m.) the Speaker declared the House adjourned till Wednesday, at twelve o'clock m.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 356) fixing the compensation of bailiffs and criers of courts in the District of Columbia, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia; which was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 460) in relation to persons imprisoned under sentence for offenses against the laws of the United States, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 474) to authorize and require amendments and to cure defects in proceedings in the courts of the United States, to report it back, and to say that the law as it stands gives all the authority which the bill proposes, and the committee therefore recommend its rejection. I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to examine the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no objection to allowing an opportunity for that purpose; but perhaps the Senator did not hear me when I stated that the committee recommended the rejection of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, no.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I withdraw any objections to its present consideration.

WASHINGTON COUNTY HORSE RAILROAD.

Mr. MORRILL. The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 380) to incorporate the Washington County Horse Railroad Company in the District of Columbia, which came from the House with certain amendments, have instructed me to make the following report: that the Senate concur in the second and third amendments of the House, and concur in the first and fourth amendments, with amendments.

I ask for the present consideration of the subject.

There being no objection the Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill. The first amendment of the House of Representatives was on page 4, at the end of line twenty-four, to insert the words "shall call a meeting."

The Committee on the District of Columbia proposed to amend the amendment by striking out the word "shall."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

The next amendment of the House was on page 5, line seven, to strike out the word "directed" and to insert the word "directors." The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment of the House was on page 6, line two, to strike out the words "when requested" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "annually."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next House amendment was to add the following as a new section to the bill:

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That the levy court of the county of Washington are hereby prohibited from doing any act or thing to hinder, delay, or obstruct the construction or operation of said railroad as herein authorized.

The Committee on the District of Columbia reported an amendment to the amendment, adding to it the following:

But Congress may at any time alter, amend, or repeal this act.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

DEBTORS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. MORRILL. The same committee, to whom were referred the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 218) exempting certain property of debtors in the District of Columbia from levy, attachment, or sale on execution, have instructed me to report them back with a recommendation that the Senate concur in the first and third amendments of the House, and non-concur in the second amendment. I ask for their present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill. The first amendment was after the word "library" in line twenty-four to insert "not exceeding in value $400."

The amendment was concurred in.

The second amendment was to add to the bill the following proviso:

Provided, however, That this act shall not in any manner interfere in the collection of debt or in the enforcement of any contract made prior to the passage of this act, and shall apply to cases founded upon contract only. The officer charged with the execution of any writ of attachment or execution shall ascertain the value and amount of provisions to be allowed to any family under this act by summoning three householders of the District, who shall be first duly sworn by such officer faithfully to perform their duty, and proceed to set apart the provisions necessary for the debtor's family, according to this act, if such provisions be found on the premises or in possession of the debtor; and if not, they shall make out and return to such officer the value of such provisions, and the same shall be allowed in any property of the debtor.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The third amendment of the House was to strike out the word "the" where it first occurs in the title and insert "certain."

MISSOURI STATE MILITIA.

Mr. HENDERSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia be instructed to inquire if under the present legislation of Congress the ten regiments of United States troops, known as Missouri State militia, who were organized in said State and served for three years during the late war, are entitled to receive bounty, and if not, that said committee inquire into the expediency of so amending the bounty laws as to enable them to receive the same.

HEIRS OF JOHN E. BOULIGNY.

Mr. HARRIS. I move to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 438.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 438) for the relief of the heirs of John E. Bouligny was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to confirm to Mary Elizabeth Bouligny, Corinne Bouligny, and Felice Bouligny, the widow and children of John E. Bouligny, deceased, the one-sixth part of the land claim of Jean Antoine Bernard d'Autrive, in the State of Louisiana, the one-sixth part amounting to seventy-five thousand eight hundred and forty acres. Inasmuch as the lands embraced in the claim have been already appropriated by the United States to other purposes, certificates of new location, in eighty acre lots, are to be issued to Mary Elizabeth Bouligny, for her own benefit and that of her minor children, to be located at any land office in the United States, upon any public lands subject to private entry at, a price not exceeding $1 25 per acre.

Mr. HARRIS. I have given to this claim much more attention than I should otherwise have done but for the large amount involved. The bill proposes to grant to this family seventy-five thousand eight hundred and forty acres of land. It is a large amount; and I have examined it with great attention and with an anxious desire to get at the very right of the case. It is no new claim. It has been before Congress for a long while, and often presented for its consideration.

The claim has its foundation in a Spanish grant. Upon the first settlement of Louisiana the king of France granted to a person by the name of Duvernay a tract of land running from the Mississippi river to the Atchafalaya river, upon which he settled a colony. Afterward, when the territory of Louisiana came into the hands of the Spanish Government, the Spanish governor ordered this tract of land to be surveyed, and, upon a report of the survey to the Spanish governor he confirmed the grant; so that this claim has for its foundation a grant from the French Government, and then subsequently a grant from the Spanish Government. The tract was transferred to a person by the name of d'Autrive. He lived upon it during his whole lifetime and died upon it. After his death his widow married another person and removed to another part of the territory, taking with her the infant children of d'Auville. This tract of land, therefore, was abandoned, and when the territory came into the hands of the United States it was unoccupied. The United States took possession of this tract of land and have disposed of it.

The matter was placed in the hands of Edward Livingston, who was a member of this body I believe at one time, and a member of the Cabinet in 1821, and remained in his hands for management and presentation to the Government for many years; but he neglected it, paid no attention to it, so far as the case shows. In 1835 an act of Congress was passed allowing claims under Spanish and French grants in Louisiana to be presented to the register and receiver of lands in that land district. This claim was presented to those officers and examined with great care obviously. Their report shows that they examined it with attention, and they reported in favor of the confirmation of this grant; but Congress never acted upon it. This report was made, I think, in 1837.

In 1844 another act of Congress was passed allowing claimants in Louisiana to present their claims to the district court of the district in which the lands were located. This claim was brought before the district court in New Orleans and very fully examined by Judge McCaleb, the judge of the district court at that place; and he wrote a very elaborate opinion on the subject, in which he confirms this grant. But there was an appeal from the decision of the district court, as was authorized by the law, to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Supreme Court reversed that decision upon technical grounds, upon the ground that in this particular case the district court had no jurisdiction; not, however, having examined the case at all upon its merits; so that both these applications have in fact failed, although the reports were decidedly in favor of the claim upon its merits.

Then the case was brought before Congress, and it has been before Congress three or four times. In 1860 a full report was made by the Committee on Private Land Claims in the House, and the bill passed there. In 1863 another report was made in favor of the claim, and the bill again passed. On one occasion a report was made in this body in favor of the claim, and it passed here; but on all these occasions the bill failed to pass in the other House; so that it never became a law. Now, the Committee on Private Land Claims, upon a very full examination of the facts, have reported in favor of the claim. They report only in favor of one of the claimants. As to the claimants residing in Louisiana, the committee are not aware of their condition as to loyalty, and they therefore report for only one sixth of the claim, in favor of the estate of Mr. Bouigny, who, at the time of the breaking out of the rebellion, was a member of the House of Representatives, and a loyal man, and who died in this city in 1864, leaving a widow and two children. This bill awards to that family the one sixth of the claim.

Mr. HENDERSON. How much is that?

Mr. HARRIS. Seventy-five thousand acres.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not understand from the statement of the honorable Senator how the claimants in this case became entitled to this land. In what way were they related to the family that occupied the land and abandoned it?

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Bouigny was one of the descendants of d'Auville, to whom the land was confirmed by the Spanish governor, and was entitled as heir-at-law of d'Auville to one sixth of the claim.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I understand that this is for seventy-five thousand acres of land, and that it is only one sixth part of the whole amount which will be claimed if the other claimants come forward and show their loyalty. That will amount to over four hundred thousand acres of the public lands appropriated to a claim which, upon its statement, is certainly very ancient in its origin, and I presume doubtful in character, from the fact that it has not heretofore received the indorsement of Congress, that is, of both Houses, when there was leisure for its consideration. Now, sir, I am unwilling to vote so large and enormous a claim upon a brief verbal statement made in this Chamber and without an examination of the papers. It seems, upon the very face of that statement, that the party or parties entitled to this land at one time abandoned it, gave up altogether their claim, went off to another section of the country; and that in that condition, when the lands were entirely abandoned, when there was no claim in behalf of any private party, the United States assumed jurisdiction over them and proceeded to sell them out, and the country was settled, improved, and brought into cultivation. When it became very valuable, at a subsequent period of time, we do not know how long, some of the parties came forward and revived their ancient pretensions.

I confess, sir, that I do not feel much inclined to vote for these ancient claims. We are asked to administer equity or favor in the third or fourth generation frequently on account of some alleged injustice committed upon the ancestors of a claimant two or three generations back—fifty years back, one hundred years back. I think we ought to confine ourselves to those cases of claims recent in their origin and unquestioned in their justice which are before Congress in both Houses. I believe the House of Representatives at the last session adopted a rule that they would investigate and pay no claim whatever if any of the States which were engaged in this rebellion, no matter whether the claimant was a loyal person or not. That House deliberately shut the doors of Congress against any claimant whatever for any claim of recent origin, any claim that is new, no matter how meritorious it may. That is the existing condition of this subject of claims. Why then, sir, you should pass by recent claims which you can investigate, why you should pass by claims in favor even of loyal persons in the southern country who have peculiar claims upon you, why you should pass by claims which you can investigate upon fresh evidence, and go back and revive these ancient claims, I cannot understand. I shall vote, at present, without an opportunity to investigate this subject further, to postpone this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time?

Mr. BUCKALEW. I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill for the present.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the bill will not be postponed. The Senate is as ready to act upon it perhaps as ever it will be. All that can be said against the claim, all that is said by the Senator from Pennsylvania is, that it is an old claim. It has been examined very often and by different tribunals, by committees of this House, by committees of the House of Representatives, by the district court of Louisiana, by the receiver of the land office, and they have always, whenever it has been examined, reported favorably upon it. There has never been an adverse report, never been a word against the claim; and all that can be said against it now is that it is a large claim, and that it has been of long standing. I hope the Senate will act upon it.

Mr. BROWN. I have had my attention called to this case for the first time this morning by the statement of the chairman of the committee that has reported it. It is certainly a case of a great deal of magnitude and involving a great many questions that I am not prepared to pass upon at this moment. I think it would be better if it should be accompanied by some printed statement of the facts and of the evidence laid on our table, so that we may have some opportunity of examining it, and at least have an opportunity of reading and pondering more carefully the statements which have been made in connection with it. I have no doubt but what the chairman of the committee is fully satisfied in his own mind of the propriety of this claim and the propriety of this action; but it is a matter which each of us I think ought to have some reasonable opportunity of satisfying ourselves about. I therefore hope that the motion which is made by the Senator from Pennsylvania, that this case be laid over or postponed until we have some report of that sort laid before us, may prevail.

Mr. CONNESS. It is just in this way that this claim has been postponed so long. If it be not passed upon until every member of Congress shall fully understand it and go through the voluminous examinations that have heretofore been made, it will never be passed upon at all. It will be remembered, Mr. President, that there is a constant tendency with our Government to postpone and procrastinate the determination of land titles, particularly titles that originated in former foreign territories before our Government came in possession of them. For instance, twenty and more years have already passed since the United States acquired the Territory, now the State, of California, from Mexico. The titles of American citizens to lands in that Territory could have been settled in two years after the United States obtained possession, justly to the Government and justly to the claimants; but twenty years of time have passed and those cases are far from being settled, and in the mean time many of the claimants have been reduced to utter beggary by the procrastination and the difficulties and the embarrassments placed in the way of their obtaining the most simple justice by the Government of the United States. Now, sir, what examination can we make of a case like this but to commit it to our most careful committees and receive their reports in the premises? I confess that I am indisposed to further delay the case, and I hope the Senate will vote upon it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I recollect that this claim was thoroughly considered by Mr. Crittenden, of Kentucky, while he was a member of this body, and that he took great interest in it, and approved it, and desired its passage; and from what I have learned of the claim I have no doubt that it is just and proper. I shall therefore vote against any postponement, and in favor of the passage of the bill.

Mr. BROWN. I suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania whether it would not be a more proper motion to move that this bill be recommitted, with instructions to the committee to make a written report setting forth the facts in the case.

Mr. BUCKALEW. If the Senator desires to submit that motion I will withdraw mine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania withdraw his motion?

Mr. BUCKALEW. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROWN. I move then to recommit the bill with instructions to that effect.

Mr. STEWART. I hope that motion will not prevail. The Senator from New York has said that he has made a very thorough investigation of the claim. I believe from what I know in such cases that these dilatory motions have produced the very results complained of here, that is, the presentation of old claims. After a Senator has taken great pains to investigate a subject of this kind, which requires lengthy investigation, and there have been several reports upon it, I think it should be acted upon.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think I know enough of this class of claims to justify me in expressing the opinion that Senators individually will never be able to investigate this particular case. I suppose there is no Senator who would not be willing to leave the adjudication in regard to a piece of land to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims, who came to this body from the supreme court of his own State; and I need not refer to the other gentlemen of the committee, gentlemen eminent in the profession. Their adjudication, so far as we are concerned, I think is entitled to almost the weight of a judicial determination of the question. I cannot undertake to examine this case. I know very well that we ought to examine such cases; at least that they ought to be examined in the Senate with care. I think I was satisfied of the improper decision of one or two cases while I was connected with the land office; but I do not believe that the fact that a claim has been postponed by the Government from time to time is a sufficient reason to defeat it.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the motion to recommit will not prevail. There have been four or five elaborate reports on this claim, all in favor of it, and if it were recommitted with instructions it would be only to repeat in a new report what has been said half a dozen times in others.

Mr. GRIMES. But we have not seen them.

Mr. HARRIS. Those reports are on the files.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Private Land Claims, with instructions to make a written report of the facts involved in the case.

The motion was not agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. WILSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I have done my duty in calling the attention of the Senate to this subject. I cannot vote for this bill, at least until I have time and opportunity to read some report on the subject. The idea of voting $500,000, or voting a bill which will involve in connection with other bills an appropriation of $500,000 out of the Treasury upon the verbal statement of a single member of this body that he has examined it and is satisfied with it is a mode of doing business which I cannot sanction by my vote.

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted—yeas 30, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Dixon, Edmunds, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Patterson, Poland, Ramsey, Biddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Wade, and Willey—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Fessenden, Fogg, Foster, Grimes, Henderson, Kirkwood, Williams, and Wilson—10.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cattell, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Guthrie, Nesmith, Nye, Pomeroy, Ross, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Yates—12.

So the bill was passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 239) to prescribe a rule concerning members of the bar, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 253) to punish for the removal of dead bodies from the grave or other place of interment in the District of Columbia;

A bill (H. R. No. 668) to limit the time for bringing suits before the Court of Claims;

A bill (H. R. No. 901) to regulate the selection of juries for the several courts of the District of Columbia; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1038) providing for an additional term of the circuit court of the United States in the eastern district of Arkansas, and for other purposes.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the bill (H. R. No. 718) to provide increased revenue for imports, and for other purposes, which is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. SPRAGUE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I do not intend to delay the action of the Senate on the amendments which I yesterday indicated my purpose to propose, but simply to say that I have given to the flax interest my most earnest and anxious consideration; I have spent days and nights in endeavoring to bring the provisions affecting it into such form and shape as would conform with the duties placed on other great interests by the bill. As to the proposition suggested by me yesterday in relation to exempting the raw material from duty, I will say that the consideration of it is simply a question of time. My own judgment is that to-day is the time when the tax should be withdrawn, and hereafter, when the manufacturing interest has been fully developed, the flax interest as well as the wool interest and the iron interest may come up and demand that their product shall receive the consideration of the Senate and of the country. I appreciate the position that is taken in the West and in the Northwest in favor of protecting these great interests. I believe they are as much entitled to protection, whether in the shape of a raw material or a manufactured product, as any articles that have received value from the best appliances of machinery. I am no advocate for receiving protection for one branch of American industry without conceding it to all; and I shall not at this time ask the Senate to withdraw the duty proposed by the Committee on Finance to be imposed on the unmanufactured flax. I now send to the Chair the amendments which I propose to the sixth section of the bill as reported by the Finance Committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island to the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance will be read in their order.

The Secretary read the first amendment of Mr. SPRAGUE, which was to strike out of section six of the amendment of the Finance Committee lines seventeen, eighteen, nineteen, twenty, twenty-one, twenty-two, twenty-three, and twenty-four, and in lieu of them to insert:

On burlap, canvas paddings, duck, cot bottoms, four cents per square yard, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem.

On all brown and bleached linens, damask table linens, damask brown holland, Spanish linens, blay linens, coatings, drills, diapers, crash, huckabacks, handkerchiefs, lawns, or other manufactures of flax, hemp, or jute, or of which flax, hemp, or jute is the component material of chief value, valued at thirty cents or less per square yard, five cents per square yard, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem; valued at over thirty cents and not over sixty cents per square yard, ten cents per square yard, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem; valued at over sixty cents and not over one dollar per square yard, fifteen cents per square yard, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem; valued at over one dollar per square yard, twenty cents per square yard, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. SHERMAN addressed the Senate. [His speech will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. CATTELL. The Senator misstates me when he says that I stated $305,000,000 to be the amount of foreign goods imported last year. That was the amount imported into the port of New York alone at the gold value, and I showed by a calculation further on that when you add to that amount the usual quantity imported at other ports, as shown by the averages of other years, and when you then add to that the estimate which the Secretary of the Treasury himself makes, that there is a loss of twenty per cent. by undervaluations and smuggling; and then when you reduce this result to our currency value, the aggregate reaches between six and seven hundred million dollars of importations, instead of three hundred millions, which is a very different figure. And I suggest here again, as I did yesterday, that no careful observer of the financial affairs of our country will admit that we can afford to continue to import even at currency value the enormous amount of six or seven hundred million dollars of foreign goods.

Mr. SHERMAN. I certainly did not wish to do my friend injustice, but I quoted the gold value of the productions of this country as given by him at $6,700,000,000, and consequently I had a right to give the amount of importations at the gold value also. If you reduce both to the currency value the effect will be the same. I have before me a table of the importations, including specie and articles admitted free of duty, amounting to $437,000,000. It is in Mr. Wells' report. From that ought to be deducted articles admitted free of duty and bullion sent backward and forward to pay the balances on importations, probably about three hundred and fifty millions.

Mr. CATTELL. I beg to say in reply that the statement which I made was for the calendar year 1866, and not for the fiscal year; and that it was based upon statements received from the New York custom-house for the calendar year 1866. The enormous increase of importations was in the last half of the calendar year 1866. The figures stated by the Senator from Ohio are true in regard to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866; but the calculations I made were based upon figures I obtained of the importations in the calendar year 1866, ending on the last day of December. The importations were very largely increased during the latter part of the calendar year for reasons which I gave in the course of my remarks yesterday. The apprehension or the supposition that the Senate would probably pass the House bill, or something in the shape of it, stimulated importation to a very large amount, and consequently the sum total of importations for the calendar year 1866 is very much greater than for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, which included only six months of 1866, and six months of 1865.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, the amendment pending has reference entirely to the section of the bill which relates to linens. The honorable Senator from Rhode Island has moved a very essential change in that particular section—section six. I have no intention to make a general speech upon the bill; what I may say will be confined to details as we go along; but I am very glad that the general principles applicable to the whole subject have been so ably laid down by my colleagues on the Committee on Finance, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CATTELL] and the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.]

With regard to this particular amendment I wish to say that it varies very essentially from the provisions of the House bill on the same subject. The Senator from Rhode Island, to accomplish what he desired in reference to the protection of the linen manufacture, was at first disposed to strike out entirely the duty laid on what I must continue to call the raw material (though a product of labor) out of which linen is manufactured. I understand him, however, to have withdrawn that or not to insist upon it. It is very obvious that he is right in the latter conclusion, because if it is important to encourage the linen manufacture in this country it is also important to encourage the growth and preparation of the article from which linen is made. Up to this time, as I understand, we have in this country no growth of flax to any extent that is used or could be used as it has been operated in the manufacture of linens.

Mr. SHERMAN. Allow me to state to the Senator that the ordinary flax produced in this country is precisely like the flax made in Ireland, except that the fiber is allowed to ripen to secure the seed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is exactly what I was about to say. The flax is grown in this country merely for the production of seed, and is therefore permitted to ripen, and it becomes unfit in that process for use in the manufacture of linen. The farmers in this country have found their profit in raising flax for seed, thus permitting it to become a coarse and rough fiber. It grows until it becomes ripe, and of course is unfit for manufacture. We have been obliged, for the purpose of the linen manufacture, so far to import flax which has not gone to that degree of ripeness, not advanced to that period when it is no longer fit for the uses to which this section particularly refers.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Permit me to interrupt the Senator. I desire to state that there are two stalks produced by the flax seed, one upon which the seed grows, and one upon which it does not; and the custom in countries where they cultivate it for the fiber is to pull that stalk on which there is no seed before they take that upon which there is seed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am obliged to the Senator for his information; but it only goes to sustain the position that in this country we have confined ourselves thus far very much to the growth of flax for the purpose of seed. But although that is the case, yet if we are to encourage the manufacture of articles from flax in this country it is very proper to make it an object to the farmers or growers of flax to raise it and take it at that particular period of its growth when it is used for that purpose, and that is the object of the section. But up to this period the linen manufacture has made no very great advance here; and it is hardly worth our while with reference to a revenue tariff to take all at once such action as will effectually cut off the importation of these articles; while at the same time it is advisable so far as we can to encourage reasonably a commencement upon this very important manufacture.

There is the distinction, as I apprehend, between the House bill and the Senate bill, which latter bill is founded mainly upon the report made by the Commissioner who examined the subject with very great care, and received a great deal of evidence upon it on both sides. The Committee on Finance did not think it worth while on this point to be prohibitory. And they took into consideration another question in several parts of this bill—and I would direct the attention of the Senate to that, because there are portions of the bill which are founded upon that idea—that while we are protecting the manufactures of the country, which is a matter of great importance, which I have always sustained and probably always will sustain, there is one great interest that should not be forgotten that has been heretofore considered by all nations as a very important part of national wealth, a great national arm; and that is the foreign commerce of the country.

It is obvious that if we carry our tariff system so far in the protection of manufactures and in the excluding of articles from foreign countries as to cut off importations, leaving out of view the revenue question, which has been so well discussed by my honorable friend from Ohio, we in fact destroy our foreign commerce, for if nothing be imported we are not in a condition to export to any great extent, and if we have no trade with foreign countries so far as purchasing any of their products is concerned we shall be very likely to have no commerce. That is now not exactly the condition of our foreign commerce, but it is tending to that with such rapidity that every man who feels that commerce is a great arm of national wealth must also feel that it is necessary to do something with reference to that interest, and that in protecting manufactures we should not destroy what certainly is of equal necessity to the country as any one manufacture or perhaps any considerable number of manufactures.

We had reference to that consideration somewhat in going through this bill. When we looked at certain articles which form a considerable item in our commerce with foreign countries, we inquired whether on the whole it was worth our while to go so far as to prohibit the importation of all articles of that description and thus end our commercial relations with those countries.

In regard to these very articles of linens we get from a Power which is certainly as friendly to us as any Power on the face of the earth, as was shown during our late troubles—I allude to Russia—a very important article of linen manufacture, crash and coarse linen, which is made by the peasantry there. In fact we have very little trade left with Russia except in these articles. Indeed, I am informed that the House bill will pretty much put an end, not only to this trade, but to our trade with Germany. I do not think it will, because all experience has shown that no matter how high you put the tariff, even if you go to such an extent as to make it what is called prohibitory, it does not in the end turn out to be actually prohibitory, but there will be some trade left. I would not, however, for light considerations undertake to interfere with an important article of trade with an important and friendly Power unless I saw that it was a matter of extreme necessity with reference to some particular manufacture in our country which it was essential to support, so that it became on the whole advisable.

I am a protective tariff man, and I believe I am an older protective tariff man so far as congressional action is concerned than any member of the Senate, and probably older in years than most members, for I happened to be a member of the Congress that passed the celebrated tariff act of 1842, and I lent my feeble aid to its passage, and on every occasion since when I have had an opportunity such aid as I could render has not been wanting to sustain the same principle and the same idea. But with regard to the doctrine of protection per se, I do not go so far as to say that whatever may be the condition of the country it is advisable at any and all times, when an interest springs up which may be valuable in itself, to put an end to all trade which might interfere with that interest. I hold that with regard to some great interests of the country protection is so absolutely necessary that, if there were no other way of accomplishing the object, I would go to the length of prohibition for the sake of protecting them, because they are essential to national protection as well as to national wealth. In this list I would include iron and the manufactures of iron, and wool and woolen manufactures. I might name others, but these two are sufficient.

But the idea has seemed to prevail of late that if any body chooses to start a new manufacture by way of experiment, thinking he can succeed in it, forthwith it becomes the duty of the country, whatever may be the effect on foreign commerce, or whatever may be the effect by way of taxation upon the individuals using the article; to at once place such duties on the foreign article as will effectually prevent the importation of that article if it interferes in any way with the prosperity of the manufacture thus started. I do not go so far as that. I think we must conform to circumstances and proceed gradually in reference to such matters.

I hope I shall be excused for making these general observations; I do not intend to repeat them. With regard to this matter of linens, I can only say that I hope the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island will not be adopted. In the first place—he will excuse me for referring to it again—it is perfectly obvious that we should protect the raw material. We do not go near so far in that respect as the House bill, and yet we furnish what would be unquestionably an adequate protection. With reference to the manufactured articles, the Senator complains that we put very low duties on low-priced articles, and he has singled out one, the article of burlaps. Its use, as I understand, is principally confined, almost exclusively, to the manufacture of cotton bagging, as it is called, that is, bagging used for cotton bales. We do not think it advisable just at present to heap any more burdens upon the cotton business of the country than we are obliged to do. It is in a very depressed condition. It is unquestionably an important article, an agricultural product intimately connected with the national wealth; and it being a coarse article, hardly manufactured here at all, we do not think the time has come to lay a heavy duty on it.

Then take the article of crash, which I before mentioned. It is an article not made in this country, and will probably never be made here. The crash made here is a mixture of linen and cotton, a totally different article from the coarse crash made by the Russian peasantry, and which goes into the hands of every individual almost. It would be laying a heavy burden on everybody who uses a towel or any cloth made from this coarse crash to put a high duty on it.

We place an ad valorem duty of thirty-five per cent. on all these articles, but Senators will see at once that as the article grows in fineness, and consequently in price, the duty becomes higher; for instance, upon a handkerchief which costs a dollar, thirty-five per cent. is thirty-five cents, which would seem to be a pretty good protection. These articles are not manufactured in this country at present. The protection afforded by this section, as we think, is sufficient—sufficient to accomplish the purpose of starting the business in this country if anybody is disposed to start it.

The Senator says certain machinery has been purchased under the encouragement of Congress providing that it might be imported free of duty. Well, they have got the machinery in free of duty, but they imported it under the existing tariff, knowing what the duties were. Knowing what the duties were and asking that they might be permitted to import that machinery free of duty, they must be understood as saying that they could get along under the tariff as it stood at that time. It seems, however, from their present statements that they were wrong in their calculation. But however that may be, we have put the duties as high as we think the article will bear. The Commissioner had all these people before him—I do not mean everybody engaged in the trade, but large numbers; he examined the matter carefully, and he informs me that a considerable majority of those interested in the manufacture of linen told him that thirty-five per cent. placed upon the manufactured article would be sufficient protection. This was only last summer. He reported thirty per cent., but we have raised it to thirty-five. They were satisfied with that, though certain individuals claim more, and those individuals come here and are persistent in their claim.

I have great respect for the manufacturers of this country, as much as I have for any other class of men; they are intelligent, and they understand their own interests. But I tell the Senate now, from the testimony before the committee, and from all the information we have, that it will not do for us to leave the formation of a tariff to the manufacturers themselves. They have too much interest in it, and, as Sam Patch used to say, there is a great deal of human nature in men, and there is no end to the claims they will put forward for protection. We must exercise our own judgment upon the question.

On this point the Commissioner examined the matter with great care; he received testimony; and he came to the conclusion that he did. The committee have examined it, and they are satisfied with the section on the reasons stated and the information afforded to them. It is best, in my judgment, to let the section stand as we have reported it. If, when it goes back to the other House, that House, on reexamination, should think we have not gone high enough they will change it, and then the committee of conference, which will undoubtedly be appointed, will agree upon something that will be just to all parties. I am satisfied with it as it is, and I hope the Senate will not agree to the amendment proposed.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, as is the case with my friend from Maine, I have from the first been in favor of protecting the domestic industry of the country by Congress, having no doubt either as to the power or as to the expediency of doing so. It is useless now to say anything on the subject of the power or in relation to the expediency, as it is true that, since 1828, to go no further back, Congress at various times have exerted the power; and as far as I am advised, and as I believe, the prosperous condition of the country, and that condition which enabled it to go through the late war, through which we have gone successfully, is to be referred in a great measure to the existence of that system. No country in the world could get on without the power to adopt it; nor, as I believe, without exercising that power from time to time, as the exigencies of every country would require it to be exercised. The States before the adoption of the Constitution had undoubtedly the power, and that power consisted in their authority to legislate in relation to commerce and their authority to lay duties. When the power of regulating commerce between the United States and foreign nations was conferred upon Congress, and from its very nature became exclusive of the same power in the States, and when the power to levy duties was vested in Congress with no limitation at all except that of requiring them to be uniform throughout the United States, the States ceased to have that power. If there is no authority under either of these branches of power to protect the domestic industry of the country the result would be that it cannot be protected at all.

But I agree with my friend from Maine that the protection may be carried to a very mischievous extent, and that that is particularly the case in the existing condition of the country. We have now a debt of thousands of millions, and the greater portion of that debt we have promised to pay in gold. The war made it necessary for us to issue a currency not redeemable in gold, and to make it available in the discharge of individual debts and in the discharge of Government debts, as between the Government and its individual citizens; but the character of the Government—I mean its character abroad—and the necessities of the Government, when they were obliged to contract loans, demanded, in order that they should sustain the one and contract the other upon better terms than they could otherwise do, that they should promise to pay the interest of the debt, and eventually when it should fall due the debt itself in coin; and they have provided that, for that purpose, the duties upon imports shall be paid in coin. There is not now upon our statute-book any other recourse which the Government has to receive the coin with which to pay its debts, unless you force it to go into the market and buy it; and I do not suppose that any Senator would desire to see the country in that situation.

The practical working of the system as it now stands has been to satisfy the public creditors, and to satisfy those who may wish to invest their funds in the stocks of the United States that the faith of the Government, as to the mode of paying the debt when it matures and the intervening interest, will be strictly observed. We have now in the Treasury some one hundred millions I believe of coin, and we can go on from time to time to enlarge it if it shall be necessary, and in that way to prepare certainly the means of meeting our engagements with the public creditors, and eventually to enable us to return to a specie paying currency.

If this bill, therefore, has the effect materially to reduce the revenue from imports, it is, in my judgment, injudicious. Whether it will materially reduce that or not I am not sufficiently acquainted with the subject to say. The Commissioner, to whose intelligence every one bears testimony, and the Committee on Finance of the Senate, who are known to us to be familiar with the subject, think that the passage of the bill in the present form will not materially affect the revenue from imports. If they are right in that judgment, and it is not for me to say they are wrong, then the danger in which the country would be involved if the revenue from that source was materially diminished does not exist, and that being the case in their judgment, and I have faith in their judgment, I shall support the present tariff bill in its leading features.

There are some provisions in the bill which do not meet exactly with my approval. I do not mean those portions of the bill which impose a tax upon foreign importation exclusively, except only in relation to certain articles. My friend from Ohio has, I think properly, stated that in principle there is no distinction between the labor which man employs in producing one commodity for practical use and that which he employs in producing any other commodity for practical use. In his State they raise sheep; and they are very rapidly increasing in the culture of sheep. The same thing is true of several of the western States. If it true, as we know, of the State of Vermont. In order to make that source of wealth remunerative it costs a great deal of time and labor. If it be right in itself, as I think it is as a general principle, to protect the commodity which the time and labor of the manufacturer in the ordinary sense of the term have bestowed on the manufactured article, it is equally right and proper to protect the grower of the wool whose time and labor have been used for that purpose.

That is not the only commodity. In Maryland and in other States there is an article which enters into the use of every family as well as every manufacturer, more or less, finds its way across the ocean on board our steamers, that is produced through the time and labor of the men who are engaged in it, the miners. The wealth is almost incalculable, or rather will be incalculable if the commodity be reasonably protected; and in Maryland it is to be found some three hundred miles more or less from the sea-board. At the mine it can be produced ready for shipment as cheap as can the coal of the neighboring islands, Nova Scotia, and other places; but the difficulty of getting to market because of its distance from the port of exportation to the rest of the country is such as to require a very large disbursement; and if our miners are brought into competition without any protection at all with the miner who has nothing to do in the way of expense but to send his commodity here on ship-board with little or no railroad transportation, they enter in the market with a competition which they are unable successfully to meet.

The anthracite coal of Pennsylvania requires no protection. There is no anthracite imported into the United States, I believe; certainly very little if any; but there is a large quantity of bituminous coal imported. Now, in the bill as it passed the House of Representatives at the last session the duty upon bituminous coal imported was fixed at $1.50 a ton. This bill proposes to reduce it to fifty cents. I will not say that this will entirely destroy the coal trade of Maryland and of West Virginia, in which a very large amount of capital is invested, but it will very materially injure it and prevent that further development of that article which is sure to be the result provided the owner of the mine sees before him something like a certainty of profit.

Now, it so happens that Maryland can, I believe, bring her coal to market so as to supply the State of Delaware and perhaps the State of Pennsylvania with her bituminous coal; but she cannot go to New York or to Boston or any of the eastern cities and compete with the foreign article, except at a sacrifice. As I understand, under the present duty she can sell coal in the markets, including New York and north of New York; but pass this bill as it now stands, and that demand, as I am advised, will be, if not entirely cut off, very much diminished.

I am aware that the New England manufacturers (I do not speak of New England with any view of disparagement) and all other manufacturers would desire to have the duty upon the imported article diminished, or, if they could, entirely taken off, because it lessens to them the expense of the production of the articles which they are engaged in manufacturing. But if it be right to encourage the New England manufacturer so as to enable him to compete with the foreign manufacturer, is it not equally just and right to encourage the domestic miner to enable him to compete with the foreign miner? What reason can be given for excluding the one from the benefit of the protection and admitting the other? How have the manufacturers of New England grown up? They have grown up under the benefit of the protective system. What has been their experience during the last war? Foreign trade being more or less entirely cut off they have been making enormous profits. They stood in need of no protection then. The papers of the day which disclosed to us their dividends from time to time told us that they were dividing twenty-five, thirty, forty, fifty, and as high as seventy per cent. Nobody complained of that. That grew out of the actual condition of the country. But the country now is in a state of comparative peace, and as I hope, is soon to be in a state of actual peace throughout all our limits. Our relations with the European world are resumed, and now she stands in need, as she says, of additional protection. I am willing to give it to her, perfectly willing; but in giving her additional protection do not accomplish it in part by taking away from us the protection which we have heretofore had, and without which we cannot live unless we live in a lingering condition.

It is impossible almost for those who have not studied the wealth which lies in the mountains of Maryland and in West Virginia and in Kentucky, and in several of the western States, to compute the value of the coal mineral which lies imbedded in their respective mountains. All that is necessary to bring them into actual operation, and to diffuse that wealth practically among all the citizens of the United States, is to encourage the miners to mine by holding out to them a prospect that they will be compensated for their labor; but the moment you reduce the duties upon the foreign article to an extent which will enable the foreign article to sell at prices which the domestic article cannot be sold for you break up the trade. Now what material difference does it make to the New England manufacturer; take the cotton or the woolen manufacturer? He wants to get coal free of duty or almost free of duty. Why? Because he can manufacture cheaper. That is one mode by which he is enabled to attain that end. The other mode is that by laying a duty upon the foreign article which he is engaged in manufacturing you enable him to sell advantageously in competition with the foreign article. The latter is all right. Why cannot both be protected? If the wool-grower is to be protected why should not the grower, so to speak, of the bituminous coal be protected? I think no sound reason can be given for the distinction; provided it be true, as we know it to be true in point of fact, that the coal in the state in which it is placed by nature is of no value to anybody. Its actual value is in its use, and its use depends upon its being brought into the market; and if you cannot bring it to market so as to enable its owner to compete with the owner of the foreign imported article, he lets it lie in the mountains where nature placed it.

I have said thus much, Mr. President, not because it is involved in the particular amendment, but following the example set by my friend from Ohio and my friend from New Jersey I supposed myself at liberty, even upon this amendment, to speak to the general question. Now, upon the particular amendment I agree with the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance that it is not advisable to adopt it at this time. And as I am unable to give any reasons for that opinion even as satisfactory to my own mind perhaps as those assigned by the chairman of the committee, I content myself with saying in conclusion that I adopt, for the reasons he states, that opinion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. SPRAGUE] to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SPRAGUE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 13, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Creswell, Dixon, Fogg, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Howe, Nesmith, Sprague, Stewart, and Wade—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Conness, Cowan, Edmunds, Fessenden, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Kirkwood, Morgan, Norton, Ramsey, Riddle, Sumner, Trumbull, Wiley, Williams, and Wilson—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cattell, Cragin, Davis, Doolittle, Fowler, Grimes, Guthrie, Howard, Lane, McDougal, Morrill, Nye, Patterson, Poland, Pomeroy, Ross, Saulsbury, Sherman, Van Winkle, and Yates—20.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The Secretary read the next amendment of Mr. SPRAGUE, which was to strike out lines thirty-three, thirty-four, thirty-five, thirty-six, thirty-seven, and thirty-eight of section six of the amendment of the Committee on Finance, and in lieu of them to insert:

On jute, flax, hemp, coir, or cocoa-nut matting and carpeting, six and a half cents per square yard, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem.

On mats and on matting, not otherwise specified, of the same or other exclusively vegetable materials, six and a half cents per square yard, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will simply remark that all the duties in this section have been framed with reference to each other, and unless we are going to adopt all the amendments of the Senator it is not worth while to adopt any of them. This jute and cocoa-nut matting is a very coarse article and comes in competition with nothing produced in this country. We do not raise any jute here. We have put the duty very low on the original article, and these are predicated somewhat on that. I hope the Senate will not, unless they see very good reason for it, change the duty which we have reported. It is as much as the article will bear.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The Secretary read the next amendment of Mr. SPRAGUE, which was to strike out from line forty-one to line fifty-one of section six and insert:

On threads, patent threads, saddlers' threads, shoe threads, gill-net thread or gill-net twine, pack thread, and sewing-machine thread, and all other threads, twines, and yarns, single and when advanced beyond single, made of flax, hemp, or jute, or the tow of flax, hemp, or jute, valued at thirty cents or less per pound, five cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem; valued at over thirty cents and not over sixty cents, ten cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem; valued at over sixty cents and not over one dollar per pound, fifteen cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem; valued at over one dollar per pound, twenty cents per pound, and thirty-five per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. CHANDLER. I see no reason why the product of linen should not receive the same protection that the product of cotton does. There is no country on earth where flax can be raised so cheaply and so abundantly as this country. It is grown now to a very considerable extent for the seed alone, and the fiber is thrown away, while we are importing millions of that same fiber which is thrown away, at an enormous expense to the nation and very little benefit to the Treasury. The cotton product has been protected until we can now successfully compete in some departments with foreign productions; though in the finer classes of goods we cannot yet compete with the foreign product; but from flax we produce nothing. I believe there is no successful manufacture of flax now in operation in the United States. I think the argument of the Senator from Rhode Island is conclusive that the product of flax should receive the same protection that the product of cotton does. There is not a State in the Union that cannot produce any quantity of tons of the raw material of flax, and aside from the difference in the value of labor we can manufacture it as cheaply in this country as anywhere else. But with the enormous prices we have now to pay—and I thank God we are enabled to pay good prices to our laborers—we cannot compete with the foreign production.

Now, the question is, whether we shall smother this infant enterprise or whether we shall grant it the same generous protection we grant to other branches of manufactures. I really hope that the Senate will review its judgment in this matter, and vote with the Senator from Rhode Island to give the same protection to flax manufactures that is given to cotton manufactures in this bill. I shall therefore vote for this amendment; and I hope the Senate will reconsider the vote by which they rejected the previous one.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I desire to say that cotton thread of the corresponding class has a duty of forty cents and thirty per cent. ad valorem, and silk thread sixty per cent. ad valorem by the provision of the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no doubt that we have capacity enough to raise flax, and I have no doubt that even the Senator from Rhode Island does not desire any change in the duty on flax itself; but with regard to this point if the Senate are disposed to throw away the evidence that has been received on the subject and the statement of the large majority of the manufacturers themselves as to what would be satisfactory to them, on the mere statement of the opinion of the honorable Senator from Michigan, they can do so. I can only say that the matter was so very thoroughly examined, first by the Commissioner on testimony, and then by the committee, that they made up their minds definitely; and I do not know what is the use of committees at all in reference to these matters if their judgment on the evidence they take is to go for nothing. If the Senate choose to adopt this amendment they had better revise the whole of section six and impose large additional duties, which the majority of the manufacturers say are not necessary, and which will undoubtedly, as we are informed, prohibit the importation altogether and cut us off from all revenue from this source.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator tell me what the revenue now is from linens?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The extent to which this amendment goes is to make a new classification, so as to place the duties we imposed on fine thread apply to thread of a coarser fabric.

Mr. JOHNSON. My question is, what is the present revenue from these articles?

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is more than I can tell you.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is it not about seven million?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I cannot now say. I hope the Senate will not change the duties as they are fixed in this section.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to ask the Senator from Maine if the manufacturers of flax are satisfied with the rates imposed in this section.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I state from the Commissioner that he had the manufacturers of flax before him in large numbers, and that a large majority of them said these duties were satisfactory.

Mr. CHANDLER. In the first place we have no fine manufactures of flax in the country.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Those who were intending to manufacture—those interested in the subject-matter.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Commissioner may have fallen in with some who professed to be satisfied, but my judgment is that the men with whom he conversed were importers and did not intend to manufacture.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator's judgment is undoubtedly better than the opinions of all these gentlemen.

Mr. CHANDLER. My judgment is based upon actual knowledge that we produce immense quantities of the raw fiber of flax: we raise it for seed and export the seed in bulk and in seed-cake, and throw away the fiber because we do not furnish a sufficient protection to our own manufacturers to induce them to work it up, and they allow it to rot. Inasmuch as there are no manufacturers of the finer fibers of flax in this country and very few of the coarser, I must say that I doubt whether the Commissioner has consulted the manufacturers of flax.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not think that the argument offered in favor of this proposed amendment, derived from that part of the tariff imposing duties upon articles manufactured of cotton, is a very sound or logical one. We have been urged to impose a high tariff upon manufactured articles to protect the capital employed in the business and to furnish employment for laborers. Now, there is a vast amount of capital, as I understand, engaged in manufacturing cotton in the United States, and a very large number of people are employed in that business, and when you impose a tariff upon fabrics manufactured of cotton you protect that capital and you protect that labor. But it is acknowledged by those who advocate this amendment that there is very little capital engaged in this business at this time, and very few persons employed, and the object of the amendment is to impose this high duty upon the consumers before the country can satisfy the demand.

Under these circumstances it seems to me that a reasonable tariff—and the one that has been reported by the committee is regarded as reasonable—one sufficient to enable this business to start, is all that should be asked. To impose a tariff now as though the business in the country could supply the demands of the country, it seems to me, would be imposing a burden upon the consumers which they ought not to bear. The articles upon which it is proposed to increase this tariff are articles that are used in the manufacture of our shoes, articles that are needed for universal consumption, articles that are needed by all sorts of people. While I am in favor of a reasonable protection to all kinds of manufacturing in the United States, I contend that we ought not to lose sight of the vast mass of people who consume these articles.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator states truly that there is but a very small amount, if any, of capital invested in the manufactures of flax in this country; but, sir, if we ever intend to have capital invested in those manufactures, we must protect them in their infancy. After you have a large amount of skilled labor and a vast amount of capital invested in any given manufacture, they are more able to compete with foreign capital and foreign skilled labor than the infant manufactures are. The imports of flax now amount to a great many million dollars. It is perhaps next to cotton in the amount that we import, and we import the whole, and permit the raw material, more than enough to manufacture all that we consume, to rot because we will not protect the infancy of our manufactures in flax. That is the true state of the case. This is perhaps a sufficient duty for our revenue; it may be all that we require for that purpose; but it is not a protection to the manufacture of flax in its infancy.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator from Michigan is very much in error on the point that he has twice presented, or else I am, as I have some knowledge from individual experience in this matter of flax. He has said that the flax is permitted to rot in America.

Mr. CHANDLER. The fiber.

Mr. CONNESS. The fiber, for want of protection. Not so, Mr. President. It is only fit to rot because it is used for the purpose of obtaining seed from it. The fiber is worth nothing for the purposes of the manufacture of linen after it has ripened its seed. Flax for linen manufacture is always pulled in the green state, then rotted, then dried, then broke, and then hackled and prepared to be made thread of; but when it is allowed to ripen for the purpose of obtaining a crop of seed it is of no value for the purpose of making linen. In proof of that I have but to state that Ireland, the great place for the manufacture of linen, where they excel in that manufacture, does not grow its own seed. They are large producers of flax, but they do not grow their own seed. They pull their crop before it ripens or produces seed; and in America the seed is raised for the Irish flax-seed, and has been for fifty years, and exported. I shall not discuss the question as to whether it would not be more profitable or economical for both countries to reverse their practice, namely: for the Irish, who manufacture linen so extensively and excellently, to raise their own seed and not import it from America, and for America to raise its own flax and make its own linen and not import linens already made from Ireland. That is an economic question that I do not propose to enter into the discussion of. But what I state in regard to the point made so palpably by the honorable Senator I am quite aware is true; so that I apprehend his argument scarcely applies to the case.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is perfectly immaterial. It shows that this country is capable of producing flax to any extent.

Mr. CONNESS. There is no doubt of that.

Mr. CHANDLER. It does not change the argument at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. SPRAGUE] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The next amendment proposed by Mr. SPRAGUE was in section six, to strike out from line fifty-two to line fifty-seven inclusive, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

On seines or nets made of flax, hemp, or jute thread, yarn, or twine, completed or in parts, valued at not over fifty cents per pound or less, ten cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem; valued at fifty cents and not over seventy-five cents per pound, fifteen cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem; valued at over seventy-five cents per pound, twenty cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FESSENDEN. With regard to that clause, we have already raised the duties by an amendment from thirty to thirty-five per cent. It stands at thirty-five per cent. now. It was thought with regard to seines, nets, and fish-lines the duty placed upon them by this bill already was high, very considerable of a duty, and it comes very hard upon the poorest class of the community, probably, and that is the fishermen, who use the nets and fish-lines and things of that sort. All over the country where ever that class of men exist they are probably the poorest class in the community, and it would not do to tax them so heavily. I hope that the Senate will not adopt the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The next amendment proposed by Mr. SPRAGUE was to strike out from line fifty-eight to line sixty-three, inclusive, of section six, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

On fish-lines of linen, or twines of linen suitable for fish-lines, valued at $2 50 or less per pound, forty cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem; valued at over two dollars and fifty cents per pound, sixty cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The next amendment proposed by Mr. SPRAGUE was to strike out from line seventy-three to line seventy-seven, inclusive, of section six, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

On webbing, tapes, galleons, bindings, gimps, trimmings, braids, plain or otherwise, made of flax, hemp, or jute, or of parts of either, or of which flax, hemp, or jute shall be the component material of chief value, sixty per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I will state that cotton articles of a corresponding nature bear a duty of sixty per cent.; and while I am up I will say in relation to the remark made by the Senator from Michigan as to the information derived by the Commissioner upon this matter, that there is a class of manufacturers who import the yarn and twist it and manufacture it into a twisted condition in this country, so that they are part importers and part manufacturers.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We have already advanced the duty in this clause ten per cent. It is high enough, and I hope it will not be changed.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The next amendment proposed by Mr. SPRAGUE was in section six, line seven, after the word "thirty" to insert "five;" so as to read:

On jute yarns, single, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. SPRAGUE. As this clause now stands it reads, "On jute yarns, single, thirty per cent. ad valorem;" whereas in the portion of the bill in which threads are referred to it specifies "flax, hemp, and jute," and it would seem that this would be unnecessary. It seems to me unnecessary, because in the provisions of the bill with reference to twines and thread, flax, hemp, and jute are referred to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But those are the ones advanced beyond single, and this is single.

Mr. SPRAGUE. As I have said before, there is no difference in these threads between single and double.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then you have got too much duty on the double; that is all.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The next amendment proposed by Mr. SPRAGUE was to strike out lines seventy-eight, seventy-nine, and eighty of section six, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

On all other manufactures of flax, hemp, jute, or similar fibers not herein otherwise specified, fifty per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Those are predicated upon the others. It is best to let it stand as it is.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That concludes the amendments proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to amend the amendment of the committee on the eighty-sixth page by striking out "twenty-four," in line sixty-three of section thirteen, and inserting "eighteen;" and by striking out "thirty" in line sixty-four, and inserting "twenty-four." It is in reference to the duties on salt. The clause as it stands reads thus:

On salt in bulk, and on all rock salt or mineral salt, twenty-four cents per one hundred pounds.

I propose to strike out "twenty-four" and to insert "eighteen."

On salt in bags or sacks, thirty cents per one hundred pounds.

I propose to strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty-four."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will simply say in explanation that this is a matter for the Senate to judge. The report of the Commissioner was precisely as the honorable Senator moves now to amend. The committee, however, raised it somewhat and put it up to its present position. The committee were not unanimous on the subject, but the majority of the committee thought it best to propose these duties instead of those recommended by the Commissioner. This is one of those cases in which we varied from his report.

Mr. FOSTER. I really hope, Mr. President, that the amendment will be made, for I think the present duty is altogether too high. The duty of eighteen cents per one hundred pounds on salt in bulk is a duty enormously high. The duty of twenty-four cents per one hundred pounds on salt in sacks or otherwise than in bulk is enormously heavy also; and it is on an article, not of luxury, not an article used by the rich alone, but which enters into the consumption of daily life of the poorest of our people; an article of prime necessity.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the present duty?

Mr. FOSTER. The present duty is eighteen cents per one hundred pounds in bulk and twenty-four cents per one hundred pounds in sacks or in any other manner than in bulk; and that I repeat is an enormously high duty. Senators scarcely realize how heavy it is. In 1861 the duty was only four cents per bushel in bulk and six cents per bushel in sacks, and it has now run up to eighteen cents per one hundred pounds—that is more than a bushel, it is true—in bulk, and twenty-four cents per one hundred pounds in sacks. That is more than one hundred per cent., and the amount of salt imported has fallen off since this increase of duty. In the port of New York, where a very large portion of the foreign salt imported is entered, the importation was two million two hundred and fifty eight thousand eight hundred and twenty-four bushels less in the years 1864 and 1865 than in the years 1862 and 1863. I have a memorandum which shows the percentage which the present rates of duty—eighteen cents and twenty-four cents—make on cargoes imported into the port of New York under the present law.

The ship Intrepid, from Cadiz, arrived in New York, February 1, 1866, with a cargo of salt. That cargo cost at Cadiz, in gold, $3,490.

The owners of the salt paid duty in New York upon that at the rate of eighteen cents per one hundred pounds, and the amount of duty thus paid on a cargo which cost only $3,490 was $5,629 14, being over one hundred and sixty per cent. duty on a prime necessary of life.

So, again, the bark Emily, from Turk's Island, brought a cargo of salt to New York, which cost in Turk's Island $1,329 58. The duties on that cargo, in gold, at the port of New York, were $2,122 20, being over one hundred and sixty per cent. on that cargo. That was all salt in bulk.

The ship La Gloire brought over fifteen hundred tons of common salt from Liverpool, which cost in that market $4,504 in gold. The duty on that in gold at New York was $6,068, or about one hundred and thirty-five per cent.

I submit, Mr. President, that those duties are enormously high even as compared with our highest duties on luxuries; and to add now six cents to the eighteen cents per one hundred pounds on salt in bulk and six cents to the twenty-four cents per one hundred pounds on salt in sacks, making the duty twenty-four cents on salt in bulk and thirty cents on salt in sacks, would be a large addition to a burden which is already quite too severe. I hope that under these circumstances this amendment will be made. The honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance suggests that the committee were not entirely unanimous in regard to this clause; there was a difference of opinion; and I hope we shall be entitled to the difference for the benefit of all who eat salt, for that, I trust, is our whole population. That that article should now be subject to this increase of tax seems to me not called for by public necessity, and will be adding to the public burdens without really any good reason.

Mr. CHANDLER. Something more than a year ago there was a meeting called of the salt interest in the United States here, representing New York, West Virginia, Tennessee, Michigan, and other salt-producing districts, and it was then decided that forty cents was as low a duty as ought to be imposed upon foreign salt. The whole of salt is labor. Michigan possesses salt enough to supply the world for a million years. Our salt basin is one hundred and twenty miles in diameter, and you can bore anywhere and pump salt. All the salt water is of the very purest description; some of it as pure as ninety-five per cent. by the salt meter. In 1860, when, as the Senator says, the duty was six cents per one hundred pounds, we could produce salt for seventy-five cents a barrel and make money. It is all labor. To-day, with the internal revenue taxes that you have placed upon every article of consumption of the laborer we cannot produce it without a loss at two dollars per barrel. There is an actual loss to-day in manufacturing salt at two dollars per barrel, whereas in 1860 we could manufacture it at seventy-five cents.

Now, sir, instead of reducing this duty from twenty-four to eighteen cents, I had intended to move to increase it to thirty cents as a fair protection and the lowest protection the salt interest ought to demand; but upon consultation with my colleague we concluded to let it go as it is. However, if a change of the duties fixed in the bill is insisted upon, I shall then move to give a fair protection, which will be thirty and forty cents. Now, sir, foreign salt is in direct competition. The great bulk of our freight is from the United States to Europe. Vessels actually pay for the privilege of taking salt as ballast on their return trip. I am so informed. It is so on the lakes. They pay for taking salt as ballast from Buffalo and Oswego to Chicago as high as six cents a barrel, because they have no freight; and I am informed it is the same on the ocean. My friend from New York [Mr. MORGAN] will assure you—and he has been engaged in this very trade himself—that the freight is so low that if freight is charged at all it will be merely nominal. You come in direct and immediate contact with the pauper labor of Europe, and it is all labor, without even freight as your protection. Now, sir, this duty is totally inadequate, and yet, as the committee had recommended it, I was willing to submit to it; but if it is touched at all, I give notice that I shall try my utmost to increase it to a fair protection, which will be thirty and forty cents per one hundred pounds.

Mr. FOSTER. If the honorable Senator from Michigan is right in his claim, it seems to me that the system which we have of raising money, either by internal revenue or by duties at the custom-house, needs an entire and thorough reform and change. He says that prior to our present difficulties salt could be manufactured in Michigan at a profit, if I mistake not, at seventy-five cents the barrel; and now, at two dollars the barrel it cannot be manufactured.

Mr. CHANDLER. Without loss.

Mr. FOSTER. Of course I mean without loss; and that, Mr. President, on an article which under all circumstances is agreed to be an article of necessity for the whole country. Our system of taxation has run a barrel of salt which could be manufactured at a profit at seventy-five cents up to such a rate that now it cannot be manufactured without loss at two dollars. I say, if that is the situation of our tax system, internal and external, it needs uprooting; the people cannot live under it; it is perfectly certain they cannot live under it; and the sooner we ascertain it the better, and—

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me a single moment?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. The same thing holds good of iron. I bought myself hundreds of tons of iron at twenty-four dollars a ton a few years ago, that cannot to-day be produced for forty-eight dollars. The same thing holds good of everything else. On the articles produced in your own State of Connecticut you came here and demanded for them suitable protection; and now, when we ask a suitable protection on our salt, after you have been protected in your manufactures, you say the system is bad. The system is bad on your part as well as on ours. If it is bad in one place it is bad all over.

Mr. FOSTER. No doubt, Mr. President. Salt, however, is manufactured in Connecticut, I will inform the honorable Senator, to a very considerable extent; and I know not whether my constituents would think I was favoring their interest in moving this reduction in the duty on salt or not. I am satisfied that it is a necessary thing to be done; and I am not attacking a western interest any more than I am attacking an eastern interest. Here are the honorable Senators from Massachusetts. I would inform the honorable Senator from Michigan that the eastern coast of Massachusetts is pretty largely engaged in the manufacture of salt. The gentleman has heard of Cape Cod. There is quite an amount of salt manufactured in that interesting locality; and in other portions of Massachusetts and along the coast of New England there is a large amount of salt manufactured. The honorable Senator is entirely hasty when he thinks, that in my own estimation at least, I am attacking a western interest. I disavow any such purpose in the first place, and the fact is entirely the other way in the next place.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Salt is manufactured very largely in New York.

Mr. FOSTER. And New York, which I suppose the honorable Senator does not count an extreme western State; he hardly speaks of it in that complaisant way as he does when he talks about the great Northwest, as part of the great Northwest—I suppose New York is about as largely interested in salt manufacture as almost any State.

Mr. HOWE. New York is a suburb of the Northwest.

Mr. FOSTER. The honorable Senator from Wisconsin says that New York is a suburb of the Northwest. Well, that is an honor for New York to have arrived at. He must settle that with the honorable Senators from New York.

Mr. President, I am not aware of being actuated by any local or sectional feeling in this matter. It seems to me, from what is said on all sides of the Chamber, that there is a necessity first of all upon us that we should reduce the cost of living. There is no greater necessity now in this country than that we should reduce the cost of subsistence. If any man can name anything more required than that I should like to know what it is. Now, to reduce the cost of subsistence, I submit that we begin properly by reducing the price of salt directly. The honorable Senator proposes to raise the price by putting the duty at thirty or forty cents per bushel in order to protect home manufactures. Mr. President, there is danger lest home manufacturers should get protected to death. That is the greater danger to-day in this country; not that the home manufacturers will not have protection enough, but that they will be protected so that they will be exterminated. The greater danger is in that direction to-day, and unless we can so vary our system as to make the cost of living in this country less than it is now it is as idle to talk of protection and of prosperity to our business, they will soon be unknown in the United States of America.

Sir, I do not, I cannot, believe that the manufacture of salt in this country, where, as the honorable Senator says, it can be manufactured so cheaply, requires a duty of two hundred per cent. to protect it. The honorable Senator talks about eastern manufactures to be protected. I ask him what article manufactured in the State of Connecticut, except salt, has a protection at all to compare with the protection on salt to-day, which is over one hundred and sixty per cent.? The most skilled and intelligent labor of Connecticut, where the workmen are paid three and four dollars a day, is not to-day protected by a duty of forty per cent. This is more than four times as much; and yet the honorable Senator says it is impossible for them to manufacture salt without a four-fold increase of duty. I trust, sir, that this duty will be reduced, not because it is a western interest, for I was quite hesitating whether I was not attacking a home interest, but if it were it would make no difference, because as I believe we have got to begin by reducing the cost of living, and unless we begin there our attempt to protect the labor of the country will be quite idle. We shall protect labor best by making subsistence cheaper; and unless we can make subsistence cheaper we may cover our laborers and their employers over with the mantle of protection, but it will be certain death to both.

Mr. CHANDLER. I congratulate the Senator upon his tremendous stride in reducing the cost of living, and I have no doubt the country will congratulate him and thank him. Each individual consumes per annum about ten pounds of salt. The Senator proposes to reduce the duty on salt six cents per hundred pounds. Well, sir, he will save every man, woman, and child in the whole United States one tenth of six cents per annum. [Laughter.] This is a commencement, and with such a tremendous start there is no telling how soon we shall get down the price of living. With this wonderful start, I congratulate the country that something is really going to be done.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Michigan has anticipated one remark that I was about to make in reference to this proposition. There is the same reason, as it seems to me, for adding to the existing duty on salt that there is for increasing the tariff generally; and it seems to be admitted upon all hands that there ought to be an increase of the existing tariff. The argument which the honorable Senator from Connecticut offers in this case applies with equal force to nearly all the other parts of this bill. Those persons who are engaged in the manufacture of salt in the United States appeared before the committee, as did the men engaged in other pursuits which need protection, and represented that their business imperatively demanded an additional duty upon salt; that the business at this time was languishing; that a large amount of capital had been invested in the manufacture of salt; that the business employed a very large number of people; that in consequence of the importation of salt under the existing tariff many of the works that had heretofore been engaged in the manufacture of salt were idle; the capital was unproductive, and hundreds and thousands of laborers were in that way thrown out of employment. They made such representations to the committee as induced the committee to believe—and some members of the committee had personal knowledge as to some of the facts—that there was as much reason why the great business of manufacturing salt in the United States should be protected as why any other great business should be protected.

It is true that salt is an article of universal consumption, and it ought to be cheap, and it is cheap, and will be cheap under this tariff when you consider the price of the article. As has been suggested by the Senator from Michigan, the consumption of the article by each individual amounts to so little that this tariff will add imperceptibly to the burdens of each consumer in the United States. It is different from many other articles produced in the United States upon which additional duties are imposed. Where an article is of great necessity and costs a large amount when purchased, there a large addition to the tariff or any addition to the tariff is made sensible to the consumer; but when you consider that each individual in the United States consumes only about ten pounds of salt, then this additional duty affects his interest very little while it protects a great manufacturing interest of the United States.

It was suggested by the Senator that less salt had been imported in 1864 and 1865 than prior to that time.

Mr. FOSTER. I said at the port of New York.

Mr. WILLIAMS. At the port of New York. That is true, I suppose, of all or nearly all articles of importation, that there was less imported during those years than prior years because the condition of the country interfered with the business of commerce. That argument, it seems to me, has very little force so far as it applies to this article, no more than it has application to other articles. The statement that he has made is sufficient evidence, it seems to me, as to the cheapness of salt in foreign countries where a whole ship load costs only $3,000. That argument of itself is sufficient to show that the manufacturers of salt in the United States cannot compete with those who produce the article in foreign countries unless they are protected. This is a large business. It is not confined to any one State; it is a business that extends into various States of the Union; and the simple question is, whether this business, in which there is so much capital invested, and which employs so many people, shall be abandoned; or whether, like the manufacture of cotton, of linen, and of iron, it shall be protected in the same way. It seems to me we ought to do justice by all interests. If we protect one interest we should protect another. Give every interest a reasonable protection; and then you put them all upon an equal footing.

Mr. FOSTER. If the honorable Senator will allow me, I will ask him why it is necessary, in order to put all upon an equal footing, to make the importer of salt pay one hundred per cent. duty when no other importer of the necessities of life pays the fourth of that?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have only to say in answer to that argument that the practical experience of the men who are engaged in the business is better than any theory that can be advanced. If it be a fact that under the existing tariff the importations of salt are breaking down and destroying the business of its manufacture in the United States I care not what theory is advanced on the subject; the practical fact is evidence that the business needs protection; and that is the point upon which I rely. I believe that the representations that were made to the committee by these persons were reliable; and as all other articles are protected, as prices have greatly advanced, as the price of wood and the price of coal consumed in the manufacture of salt and the price of labor has advanced, and as all the other articles which are used by the men engaged in this business are taxed and their price increased by the addition of a higher tariff, it seems to me that these reasons ought to satisfy us that this bill is not an unreasonable bill in the protection it affords to salt manufacturers.

Mr. FOSTER. The honorable Senator from Michigan seems to think that a great deal is achieved by dividing the amount which would be saved by the reduction of this duty among all the population of the United States, and showing that a very insignificant fractional amount it is when apportioned to each individual of our population. It is very true that the sum is trivial, very trivial under those circumstances; but if the honorable Senator will weigh his argument a little he will find it, I think, much lighter even than the fraction which he has calculated. When really stated in its force and effect, it is that this burden is so universally diffused and diffused over every human being to such an extent that it is no burden at all, because everybody feels it. Suppose that all the salt in the United States costs forty cents per one hundred pounds more—not the few ounces or few pounds that each individual consumes, but the whole consumption of the country—compute forty cents per one hundred pounds, on the whole consumption of the country, and it would make an amount that would startle the honorable Senator from Michigan. He is accustomed to deal in large figures. I do not know that it would make much difference even if he had the whole to pay, but it would make a vast deal of difference with some humbler individuals of the Senate who do not handle quite as much money as the honorable Senator.

I suppose the fair statesman-like view to take of a question of this sort is, how much is saved to the country? How many thousands or hundreds of thousands of dollars are saved to the country? And although it may amount to but a few hundred thousand dollars saved to the country, and divided among thirty million people, to each individual it would be a very small amount, still I suppose statesmen regard legislation when it comes to hundreds of thousands of dollars as of some consequence. But divide it among thirty millions, and call upon each to pay his particular share, and it is quite laughable to say that it is worth talking about! But that I submit, Mr. President, is not statesmanship. We are here legislating for the benefit of the country; and if we can save the country—I mean the population, the people of the country—even the little pitiful sum of $100,000, I think it is our duty to do it; if we can save them $500,000 I think it is our duty to do it. On that basis my opinions rest, and not on the fact that when we come to divide the duty among thirty millions on the whole it will be quite light to each person.

Mr. WILLEY. Mr. President, West Virginia abounds in this mineral as well as minerals of almost every other character. Some of my constituents have their capital invested in the manufacture of salt, and I suppose a great many more of them not so engaged are consumers of the article. I quite concur with the Senator from Connecticut that the burdens of Government should rest as lightly as possible on the necessities of life; but at the same time it appears to me that the necessities of life, because they are such, more especially need protection; that is to say, I think it would be bad policy to allow ourselves to become wholly dependent upon foreign Powers, upon importation, for any of the necessities of life; and therefore it involves the propriety, as I think, of affording to the manufacturers of salt, which is one of the necessities of life, such protection as shall enable them entirely to compete with the foreign article. What would be the result of allowing our manufactories of salt to go down? One result certainly would follow, and that is: that instead of reducing the price of this necessary of life, when there was no competitor in the market, the foreign producer or importer would most certainly increase the price. When there was no competition, of course the price of the article would necessarily be increased.

Again, sir, and more especially in time of war between us and any of those countries from which we derive this article, if the manufactories of salt at home should go down for want of protection, we should be in a very disagreeable situation. The point, therefore, that I desire to make is this: that because salt is a necessary of life, it therefore more especially requires protection to such an extent as will enable our manufactories of salt in this country fairly to compete with the foreign article. It seems to be conceded that our manufactories at home do need protection to some extent in order to enable them to do this. It is essential, therefore, to keep in operation our domestic manufactories in order that we may not be dependent upon the foreign article for this necessary of life.

There is another necessity that would necessarily ensue from a reasonable protection of the article at home, and that is it would attract capital and labor to the manufacture of this article; manufactories of it would be multiplied; the amount of the article produced would be greatly increased; the relation between the supply and the demand would be made different from what it now is. The supply would be greater than the demand, and that would bring down this necessary of life in its price, in its estimated value; and in that way this necessary of life would be furnished to the people at cheaper rates than it even now is.

This, sir, is no new idea. We have had it exemplified in almost all articles of New England manufacture. In the rough article of cottons, for instance, we can make them cheaper at home now than the foreign article can be introduced into our country without any tariff at all, duty free; and how has this resulted? It has resulted from the protection which we have afforded to our own manufactures here at home. The same result to some extent would occur in the manufacture of salt. Protection would attract capital to that business, increase the production, and decrease the price of this necessary of life. I hope, inasmuch as the committee have settled upon the duty as it now is in the bill, that it will be allowed to remain.

Mr. MORGAN. It must be evident to every one that in the bill which is reported by the committee the industries of the country are very largely protected. That fact must be evident from the debate which has taken place here to-day. No one can deny that all the industries of the country are protected, and probably protected to a greater extent in this bill than they have been in any former bill. The manufacture of salt is one of those industries—a very large interest in the State of New York. The arguments that have been presented here were presented to the Committee on Finance, of which I happen to be a member. Gentlemen appeared before the committee and made statements showing that the manufacture of salt required the duty which the committee finally agreed to impose. Those rates, as I understand, are precisely the same as those passed by the House of Representatives. They do not appear to be so in the bill as it came from the House; but I think that is a misprint. I think they passed in the House at twenty-four and thirty cents, although the latter rate appears in the House bill as printed at thirty-six cents. I believe the duty on salt in the bill as it passed the House of Representatives is precisely the same as reported by the Committee on Finance. I hope, therefore, as we have adhered, and I have myself, to the report of the committee on these other items, that the report of the committee will be adhered to on the article of salt.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask for the yeas and nays upon that amendment. I do not wish to take up time, but the Senate is so thin that I must ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 11, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Fogg, Foster, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Norton, Patterson, Sumner, and Trumbull—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Creswell, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill, Poland, Stewart, Wade, Wiley, Williams, and Wilson—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Cowan, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fowler, Grimes, Guthrie, Kirkwood, Lane, McDougall, Nesmith, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Van Winkle, and Yates—23.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CRESWELL. I move to amend the amendment of the committee on page 68, line five hundred and forty-six of section nine, by striking out the word "four" and inserting "five;" so as to make the line read:

On chromate and bichromate of potassa, five cents per pound.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest to the Chair that the word "four" has been inserted already in that clause by a vote of the Senate, and hence a motion to strike it out and insert another sum would not be in order at this time, I should suppose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont is right. An amendment has already been made in that clause. The Senator from Maryland can accomplish his object by making his motion when the bill comes in the Senate. It cannot be made in committee.

Mr. CRESWELL. I will make a motion, then, to strike out the whole of the five hundred and forty-sixth line.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment is in order.

Mr. CRESWELL. And to insert in lieu thereof:

On chromate and bichromate of potassa, five cents per pound.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That would not be in order any more than the other, I take it.

Mr. CRESWELL. The motion was not before to strike out the whole clause.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is the same thing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Precisely the same question has been decided, and in the judgment of the Chair it would not be in order.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will state with regard to that, that the rate of duty was three cents a pound; the House put it at three and half cents—

Mr. CRESWELL. I call the Senator from Maine to order. There is no question before the Senate. [Laughter.]

Mr. FESSENDEN. I submit. Is there no motion pending?

Mr. CRESWELL. No, sir; the Chair decides the amendment out of order. If I cannot speak you cannot.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I thought the motion was pending.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the amendment on page 98, section eighteen, immediately after the fourth line, by inserting:

All books, maps, charts, and other printed matter specially imported in good faith for any public library or society incorporated or established for philosophical, literary, or religious purposes, or for the encouragement of the fine arts, or for the use of any college, academy, school, or seminary of learning in the United States.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to the Senator to move to insert his amendment after "bones" between the thirtieth and thirty-first lines.

Mr. SUMNER. It would better come in there alphabetically.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection to the transposition of place. I merely followed the old law in putting it in the place that I proposed. At the suggestion of my friend from Maine I will modify the amendment by striking out the word "all" at the beginning of it, and then proposing to insert it between the thirtieth and thirty-first lines. The amendment merely keeps the free list on this class of books just as the law now is. It is a literal transcript of the existing law, with the exception of the introduction of the words "public library," it being open to some possible doubts whether, under the phraseology without that, city and town or county libraries would come within the exemption provided.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator has drawn his amendment much larger than I hoped he would draw it, and in its present shape I must certainly object to it. He includes all books imported for the use of schools. That would destroy all the publishing interests in the country pretty much. If he were to specify libraries and public institutions it would not be so objectionable; but as the tariff now stands, upon the principle the committee have adopted, to carry it so far, even although it may have been in the former tariff, would not meet with the approbation of the committee, and it would be striking a blow at the existence of the publishing interest which they could not stand. To exempt from duty all books for the use of schools would cover almost everything that would come in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As I said before, the amendment that I propose has the effect merely to leave the law as to this free introduction of books just as the law is now. I do not think that the publishing interests of the country have been injured at all, and I think my friend from Maine will not say that they have been under the existing tariff by the introduction of free books, for the reason that books that are used as school-books, in the ordinary sense of that term, the general run of school-books, are almost always imported, as a general rule, by dealers and sold in the regular way, and pay the duties. This amendment is confined to that class of books which are imported in good faith for a specific school or academy. If it happens that an academy at Portland or at Burlington wants a rare foreign book to put in its library for the information of the people there, and its managers choose to go to the trouble and expense of sending for it abroad specially, and importing it specially themselves for the use of the academy, then it is to be received free.

But this amendment which I propose is not intended to operate upon school-books in general, imported generally for the use of schools. That is not the proposition; and I feel quite confident in saying that no mischief whatever of the kind that is suggested by the Senator from Maine has arisen under this law, that has stood for years and years on the statute-book, in this respect in the precise language of the amendment that I offer, because it must not only be a school-book, but it must be a book specially imported by the school or academy for its own private use. Now, in such a case I do not think that any injury to the revenue or to the book trade will result if these words are introduced.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to hear the amendment read again.

Mr. SUMNER. It is the language of the old statute.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think the last clause had better be stricken out.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know that it has been represented, with how much truth I am not able to say, that the publishing interests of the country are suffering for the want of protection, and persons interested in that business have been very clamorous for an increase of the tariff. It seems to me that this amendment, notwithstanding it may be in the language of the old law, is exceedingly comprehensive, and it enables persons to import books into this country in large quantities to such an extent as to interfere with the book-publishing business greatly, in my judgment, to its detriment. Every society that is organized calling itself a literary, philosophical, or religious society may import any number of books professedly or really for its own use. I suppose that the society is to pretend that these books are for its own use until they are through the custom-house and into their hands, and then they can be used for any other purpose such as the society may think advantageous to their own interests.

Under this amendment, it seems to me, all the school-books of the country will be imported free of duty. Every school district in some of the large States has a school library. It is in the publication of those books that a large proportion of the capital engaged in this business is employed, and this amendment opens the door to the importation of an immense quantity of books from foreign countries to compete with the book-publishing business in the United States. I do not know of any particular reason why this exception should be made, why this business, which is a very extensive business in the country, should be subjected to greater disadvantages than any other kind of business; why these books should be allowed to be introduced here to compete with the books that are made in this country.

These societies are generally furnished with funds made up by contributions of individuals. One man may contribute a dollar and another man may contribute a dollar, and the society is just as able to buy its books as any individual is to buy his books. These colleges and societies can buy their books just as well as individuals can; and why, because a certain number of men associate themselves together and assume some high sounding name, call themselves some society, they should be allowed to import their books, their reading matter, free of duty, while an individual who does not happen to belong to that society must pay upon the book that he reads, is more than I can understand.

I know it appears to be entirely proper and desirable to be very liberal toward societies which are embraced in this enumeration of the honorable Senator, but it seems to me there is no substantial reason for it; and if the effect of it will be, as I believe, to injure the business of book publishing in the United States then it will only tend to increase the price of books to other people who have to purchase and pay without the privilege of this exemption from duty. There is an idea that has force in it, and that is, that under this amendment and through this door which is opened here, a large amount of books can be brought into this country without the payment of duty to be used not for the purposes contemplated in this amendment. It opens a door for importations of that description, and I have no doubt that importations have been made in that way, and will be made. This exception is a very large one, and it seems to me to be objectionable.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not believe the Senator from Oregon, or any Senator within the sound of my voice, can name an instance in which he has what he believes himself to be credible information of the statute which has been referred to, and which has been a statute a great while, having in any instance been abused or circumvented or defrauded.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We raise the duties very largely in this bill, and the temptation will be very much greater.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If we refuse to admit the introduction of knowledge into this country on the ground that possibly the tariff law on books in general may be defrauded we shall be assuming, as it seems to me, a singular attitude for legislators. Every law that we pass on every subject is capable of evasion; and I know of no law which has been less evaded than the very one which we are now discussing.

My friend from Oregon thinks it a hardship to the rest of mankind to allow the free introduction of foreign books, the production of foreign writers, the product of foreign intellect, because the private citizen, as he says, has to buy his own book. The theory upon which this exemption goes is, as I understand it, that the introduction of books of this description for the use of a public library, whether it is a school or a college or in some society which is organized solely for a library society, puts it within the reach of the poor man, who has not, like my Oregon friend, plenty of money to buy knowledge with, or who was not born with it, as he was, the means of improving his intellectual condition; and it is a well-known fact all over the country that there is no means so essential to the diffusion of knowledge among men, there is no means which has been so successful in diffusing intelligence among men, as the use of these very libraries.

I do not care by what name you call them, whether you call them school libraries or college libraries or libraries merely. They are bringing information to the doors of the poor, who then get it freely. They do not have to be members of library societies to be entitled to read these books. If it is a school library every child in the town, city, or district is entitled to consult those books, and to drink from the fountains of knowledge that they contain. That is the theory.

Now, I am not so much of a protectionist, although I was born in Vermont, as to believe in any prohibitory or any high tariff on knowledge. I am a free trader on the subject of knowledge; and I believe the more foreign books that we bring into the country that are fit to be used the better. The best foreign books, the productions of the best foreign intellects, do not come in competition with home intellect in the sense that we protect the productions of men's hands, because it remains to be demonstrated that the home intellect will produce the same sort of material that the foreign intellect does.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator will allow me to state that I am advised, and I have no doubt of the fact, that persons send books from the United States over to England and have them published there and brought back here, the productions of American intellect; and in that way the business of making books in this country may be very greatly damaged. The gentleman is not arguing the whole question when he assumes that this applies exclusively to books produced in a foreign country, foreign books; and I very much doubt, notwithstanding the high respect I have for all literary attainments, whether it would not be better for us to know more about books of our own country and less of those of foreign countries.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a question of taste about which I will not dispute with my distinguished friend from Oregon. He may take his choice of reading, and I will take, as far as my means will allow me, mine. I cannot argue the whole question at once because I have not the diffusive faculty necessary to hit all the points which are raised here by one single observation. Now, it is true undoubtedly, coming to the point my friend refers to, that once in a while an American author has his book copyrighted and published abroad, and it is within the range of possibility that some college or some library or some institution may send abroad and get one copy of that book. If they should, there would be so much loss to the home industry of printing that book, the benefit of which would have been received if it had been printed here. But we all know that objections of that kind are merely trifling, after all, because they are extremely exceptional; they are not general. The general rule, operating broadly and generally in favor of learning and the diffusion of knowledge everywhere, is that it has been the policy of this country and every other to permit the productions of foreign intellect to be brought in where they will be for general use, be put in a place where the poor can get them freely—to permit the introduction of such matter freely.

Now, all I ask of the Senate is, that they should adhere to the established policy and the just one upon this subject; and if you do not allow it only for those higher institutions, if you strike out schools and institutions of learning other than the colleges and seminaries of higher degree and the libraries proper, then you cut off from the common people and poor people in the villages of our country great sources of information that they ought to have; and the number of books in all that would be introduced under this provision, unless it is evaded and defrauded, would be so small as not to affect the revenue materially.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Mr. President, it is with great pleasure that I support the amendment of the Senator from Vermont. If you place a high tariff on everything, you should not in my judgment place a high tariff on knowledge. It is well known to all who have learned anything that it belonged to our early opportunities to pick up knowledge as derived from books from those which came from Europe. We have made an effort to bring books from the older countries to inform us. Probably none of the earliest reading of Senators in the very difficult parts of knowledge was in American publications. My doctrine is to protect knowledge and allow it to be free. I remember very well that I had my earliest discipline from free libraries when I was a lad, and I could not probably have commanded it otherwise.

This question is not a new one; it has been discussed before. I think there should be no tax upon the introduction of foreign literature. As to the suggestion that American books may be sold abroad, printed in London, and brought back here, that, as the Senator from Vermont says, may once in a while happen, but it does not belong to a business argument. Knowledge should be as free as the air and the water. I trust the amendment may be approved.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator from Vermont will strike out the last clause of his amendment, all after the word "arts," I shall vote for it; otherwise I shall be obliged to vote against the whole amendment, and hope it will not be adopted. The Senator from Massachusetts has an amendment which I think is better drawn, more carefully considered, which covers the same ground.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That modification would strike out colleges and societies of learning. I cannot accept it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator perhaps then had better withdraw his amendment for the present, and look at that which is drawn by the Senator from Massachusetts; which I think covers all the ground that ought to be covered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts does not cover the ground that I think ought to be covered, because I think these schools being kept within the limits of the law as to good faith—and the Treasury agents are pretty careful about free importations of every kind, as they ought to be; there is not much danger of fraud—these schools ought to be allowed to have one book of a kind, if they choose to send for it, for the free use of all their students. Differing, therefore, from my friend from Maine, I must insist upon a vote on the amendment as it stands.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I shall be obliged to oppose the amendment, although I am in favor of some amendment on this point. I think this goes too far.

Mr. EDMUNDS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 9, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fogg, Foster, McDougall, Patterson, and Wiley—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cattell, Chandler, Craig, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Morgan, Stewart, Wade, and Williams—10.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Conness, Cowan, Creswell, Davis, Fowler, Grimes, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane, Morrill, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wilson, and Yates—33.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is not a quorum voting.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 23, 1867.

OATH FOR ATTORNEYS, ETC.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is House bill No. 239, to prescribe an oath for public officers and members of the bar, and for other purposes, and by unanimous consent of the House the vote on the bill is to be taken at twelve o'clock m., without dilatory motion. The question is, Shall the bill pass? The motion to lay upon the table is considered as withdrawn.

Mr. BOYER. I ask unanimous consent to be allowed ten minutes.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. BOYER. Mr. Speaker, I had not intended originally to participate at all in the discussion of this bill; and during the very few minutes which are allowed to me now, it is of course impossible for me to present every view which, according to my conceptions of duty, ought to be presented if I were discussing the bill at length.

I am opposed to this bill because it is an attempt by legislative action to override an express decision of the highest tribunal of the country. I am opposed to it because it singles out one profession in the country to visit upon it unusual penalties for an offense which has been committed by men engaged in all occupations alike. I am opposed to it because it inflicts a penalty which involves the loss of the means of livelihood without a lawful trial or conviction of any crime. I am opposed to it because it is an ex post facto law prohibited by the Constitution. I am opposed to it because it makes no discrimination between those who voluntarily aided the rebellion and those who were compelled against their wills to enter its armies or to give aid and comfort to its cause. I am opposed to this bill also because, if it were perfectly legal in a constitutional point of view, it is not in accordance, in my judgment, with what ought to be the policy which should govern the legislation of this House. I do not know that I can better occupy the few moments accorded to me than to direct the attention of this House and the country to a portion of the opinion lately delivered by the Supreme Court in the matter of the petition of A. H. Garland, a lawyer who declined to take the test oath prescribed by this Congress, but who nevertheless was held by that tribunal to be entitled to pursue his legitimate profession. In that case the Supreme Court have said:

"The profession of an attorney and counselor is not like an office created by an act of Congress, which depends for its continuance, its powers, and its emoluments on the will of its creator, and the possession of which may be burdened with any conditions not prohibited by the Constitution. Attorneys and counselors are not officers of the United States. They are not elected or appointed in the manner prescribed by the Constitution for the election or appointment of such officers. They are officers of the court, admitted as such by its order upon evidence of their possessing sufficient legal learning and fair character."

"They hold their office during good behavior, and can only be deprived of it for misconduct, ascertained and declared by the judgment of the court, after opportunity to be heard has been afforded. Their admission and their exclusion are not the exercise of a mere ministerial power. The court is not in this respect the register of the edicts of any other body. It is the exercise of judicial power and has been so held in numerous cases. It was so held by the court of appeals of New York in the matter of the application of Cooper for admission. Attorneys and counselors, said that court, 'are not only officers of the court, but officers whose duties relate almost exclusively to proceedings of a judicial nature, and hence their appointment may, with propriety, be intrusted to the courts; and the latter, in performing this duty, may very justly be considered as engaged in the exercise of their appropriate judicial functions.'"

"The attorney and counselor, being by the solemn judicial act of the court clothed with his office, does not hold it as a matter of grace and favor; the right which it confers upon him to appear for suitors, and to argue causes, is something more than a mere indulgence, revocable at the pleasure of the court or at the command of the Legislature; it is a right of which he can only be deprived by the judgment of the court for moral or professional delinquency. The Legislature may undoubtedly prescribe qualifications for the office, with which he must conform, as it may, where it has exclusive jurisdiction, prescribe qualifications for the pursuit of any of the ordinary avocations of life; but to constitute a qualification, the condition or thing prescribed must be attainable, in theory at least, by every one. That which from the nature of things, or the past condition or conduct of the party, cannot be attained by every citizen, does not fall within the definition of the term. To all those by whom it is unattainable it is a disqualification which operates as a perpetual bar to the office. The question in this case is not as to the power of Congress to prescribe qualifications, but whether that power has been exercised as a means for the infliction of punishment against the prohibition of the Constitution. That this result cannot be effected directly by a State under the form of creating qualifications we have held in the case of Cummings vs. the State of Missouri, and the reasoning upon which that conclusion was reached applies equally to similar action on the part of Congress."

Now, what action does this bill propose? The very thing which has been judicially decided by the highest tribunal in the country to be contrary to the Constitution of the land. It is a sad spectacle, Mr. Speaker, and prophetic of approaching peril when we find a political party represented by a majority in Congress reaching forth its hands to grasp both the judicial and executive as well as the legislative branches of the Government. This bill is only a part of that legislation which, during the existence of the present Congress, we have seen continually advocated and adopted by the majority in this House.

The time was when all parties respected, at least, the Supreme Court of the United States. Whatever vituperation and abuse politicians might heap on each other, whatever epithets might be applied to him who held the chief executive office of the country, the judges of the Supreme Court received from all parties the homage which was due to a tribunal distinguished during the whole history of the country for its learning and its purity. It has been reserved for our day and for this Congress to exhibit to the nation and the world a contempt even for that tribunal which hitherto has been regarded by the whole nation as the fountain of justice, purity, and law.

The Executive is a barrier to the designs of the majority in this House, the Supreme Court is another barrier; therefore war is made upon both the Executive and the judiciary. This Thirty-Ninth Congress has been engaged from the very earliest period of its existence in attempting to control and absorb, not only the legislative, but likewise the executive and the judicial branches of the Government. For this it is that the Judiciary Committee have reported a bill which provides that when the Supreme Court of the United States sit in judgment upon the constitutionality of an act of Congress, it shall require the unanimous opinion of all the judges to decide it unconstitutional. It proposes to enact that all the judges must unite in a judgment against Congress, but a bare majority may decide in its favor.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I wish to correct the gentleman's statement as to the report of the Committee on the Judiciary. They have not reported any such bill as the gentleman mentions.

Mr. BOYER. Such a bill has at least been offered by a member of that committee, and referred to the committee, and the House and the country will see whether the committee do not report it back to the House with a recommendation that it do pass. And I would ask the gentleman, as chairman of that committee, whether in his opinion that bill will not be reported by that committee to the House and put upon its passage here?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's ten minutes have expired.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, were the yeas and nays ordered on laying this bill on the table?

The SPEAKER. They were.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish to withdraw the motion.

The SPEAKER. It was understood before the recess that the motion was withdrawn, also the yeas and nays.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I now demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I ask the indulgence of the House for about ten minutes to make a brief statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I wish to state more distinctly than I have done the constitutional and logical argument by which this bill is supported. Among the enumerated powers of Congress is this:

"To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

Following the enumeration of judicial powers, the Constitution declares:

"In all the other cases before mentioned the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make."

Secondly, further authority is given by the Constitution to Congress in these words:

"But the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they may deem proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments."

These provisions of the Constitution sustain Congress in the exercise of two kinds of power, namely: first, the enactment of all laws which Congress deem necessary and proper to carry into effect any of the powers vested in any department of the Government; and secondly, in the authority given to Congress to confer on the courts of law, as well as on the Departments of the Government, power to appoint such inferior officers as Congress may see fit.

We maintain this bill by maintaining the doctrine that an attorney in a court is an officer of the Government. We maintain it by the ancient theory, as old as the British law, of the official character of a counselor or attorney-at-law. From the very first he has been regarded as an officer of the court. The Supreme Court, in the decision which has been considered, maintain that doctrine, although they deny that he is an officer of the Government. That admission, as can be easily comprehended by any man, overturns this singular theory of the court. The Supreme Court itself is a department of the Government. Every court inferior to the Supreme Court is a branch or judicial agency of the Government, and therefore when you have demonstrated or admitted, as the Supreme Court in this decision have admitted, that an attorney is an officer of the court, it follows as a necessary consequence, from which there can be no logical, legal, or constitutional escape, that the attorney is an officer of the Government, because the court itself is either a department or a branch or agency of the Government.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I cannot allow myself to be interrupted, as I have but ten minutes of time. Under section thirty-five of the judiciary act of 1789 Congress provided by law for the appointment of these officers by the court; and as I said yesterday, the court derives its power to appoint attorneys from that act. But for that act they would be driven back upon the ancient common-law doctrine, under which the party himself was required to appear in court and manage his cause. That section is as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That in all courts of the United States the parties may plead and manage their own causes personally, or by the assistance of such counsel or attorneys-at-law as by the rules of the said courts, respectively, shall be permitted to manage and conduct causes therein."

Therefore the authority of the court to appoint an attorney is derived from the judiciary act of 1789, framed by the fathers of the Constitution; and without the authority of that act it would not to-day have constitutional or legal power to admit a single attorney to the performance of his ordinary functions in any court of the United States. They are entirely devoid of power to enact rules for the government of the courts, except through the act of 1793, which provides—

"That it shall be lawful for the several courts of the United States from time to time, as occasion may require, to make rules and orders for their respective courts, directing the returning of writs and processes, the filing of declarations and other pleadings, the taking of rules, the entering and making up judgments by default, and other matters, in the vacation and otherwise, in a manner not repugnant to the laws of the United States."

That is their limitation. They have power by the authority of law to make their rules, and that is the only power they have on the subject. The law limits this power by declaring that they shall not make any rules except such as are in conformity to the laws of the United States. The Supreme Court of the United States, many years ago, through the decision of Justice Story, recognized the authority of the Congress of the United States in this matter. He says:

"So far as the acts of Congress have adopted the forms of process and modes of proceeding and pleadings in the State courts, or have authorized the courts thereof to adopt them, and they have been actually adopted, they are obligatory, but no further. But no court of the United States is authorized to adopt by rule any provisions of State laws which are repugnant to or incompatible with the positive enactments of Congress upon the subject of the jurisdiction or practice or proceedings in such court."—Keary et al. vs. The Farmers' and Merchants' Bank of Memphis, 16 Peters, p. 94.

It is from the Constitution and laws and decisions of the courts, then, that we derive authority to pass any rule which we think necessary and proper for the performance of the duties devolved upon the courts of the country. If we have authority to give the courts power to make their own rules, we have clearly authority to prescribe exactly and definitely the rules by which the courts shall be governed; and upon this statement of the matter I submit the bill to the House.

The question being upon the passage of the bill, the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 108, nays 42, not voting 41; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. So the bill was passed.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. LAFLIN. I desire to state, in behalf of my colleague, Mr. HULBURD, that having spent the night here he was so indisposed this morning that he is unable to be present here at this time. If he was here he would vote in favor of this bill.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I desire to state that Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, is absent on leave. If here he would vote for the bill.

Mr. O'NEILL. My colleague, Mr. THAYER, is still detained at home by sickness in his family.

Mr. GRINNELL. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, is still detained from his seat by illness.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I desire to state that Mr. HENDERSON is confined to his room by indisposition.

After the call of the roll was completed, Mr. MORRIS said: I desire to say that I would have voted for this bill if I had been here before the call of the roll was completed.

The result of the vote was announced as above.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move to amend the title of the bill so that it shall read "A bill to prescribe a rule concerning public officers and members of the bar, and for other purposes."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move to reconsider the vote by which this bill has just been passed; and I also move to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SOLDIERS OF THE WAR OF 1812.

Mr. COBB, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial to Congress from the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, in relation to the surviving soldiers of the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PROTECTION OF AMERICAN TONNAGE.

Mr. PIKE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to consider the propriety of protecting the interests of tonnage now afloat, as well as to relieve the ship-building industry of the country by drawbacks of duties on materials used in the construction of vessels; and to this end that they consider the expediency of abolishing in whole or in part the tonnage tax, and of adopting a system of differential duties with regard to American ships, so that our vessels may have a share in the transportation of foreign merchandise and business now confined almost wholly to foreign bottoms.

ALLEN WILSON.

Mr. STOKES, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of Allen Wilson, of Wilson county, Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KASSON. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has now commenced, and the first business in order is reports from the Committee on the Judiciary, where the call of committees last rested.

RIGHTS OF CITIZENS IN THE STATES.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It is now about a week since the House, on motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] directed the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into certain alleged illegal acts performed by parties in the State of Maryland; and in connection therewith the committee were directed to inquire whether any additional legislation is necessary to protect citizens of the United States in the enjoyment of their rights in the several States. Upon the latter branch of the inquiry I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report a bill entitled "An act to declare and protect all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States in the several States." I move that this bill be recommitted and ordered to be printed. I will state that I intend to enter a motion to reconsider the recommitment. I shall take this course because, this being a bill of importance, members may desire to examine it, perhaps discuss it; and it would be impossible for me to afford during the morning hour that time which I desire to give to gentlemen, if they should express any wish to discuss the bill. I may state that this bill is the substitute reported by myself during the last session for the bill introduced by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] being substantially the bill introduced by him.

The motion of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, was agreed to; and the bill was recommitted, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I now move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted.

The SPEAKER. That motion will be entered.

EIGHT-HOUR SYSTEM OF LABOR.

Mr. NIBLACK. I desire to take this opportunity to propound a question to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. NIBLACK. During the last session of Congress several propositions (including one submitted by myself) in regard to what is known as the "eight-hour system" were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I beg leave to inquire of the gentleman whether the committee of which he is chairman intend at the present session to report anything to this House upon that subject.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that if the committee shall have sufficient time to get through with their reports one of the measures they will bring before the House will be a bill on that subject.

Mr. NIBLACK. The gentleman will allow me to suggest that the committee should at least report back some one of the propositions for consideration, even if the committee are not prepared to make a recommendation upon it, so that the House may take some action upon the subject.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I believe I stated during the last session that the committee had acted upon that bill, and it will be reported if we can have time to make the report.

Mr. NIBLACK. I so understood; and hence I wanted to know the reason of the delay on the part of the committee. I move that the committee have leave to report upon that subject at any time when it will not interfere with the morning hour.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I certainly have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the motion of the gentleman from Indiana will be considered as agreed to. It requires unanimous consent.

There was no objection.

CIRCUIT COURT IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. MORRIS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, a bill providing for an additional term of the circuit court of the United States in the eastern district of Arkansas.

The bill, which was read, provides in the first section that a term of the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Arkansas shall be held at Little Rock, in that district, on the second Monday in October annually.

The second section provides that the salary of the United States district judge for the district of Arkansas shall hereafter be $4,000 per annum.

Mr. MORRIS. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Does that increase the salary of that judge, and how much?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I understand he draws $2,500 now, and this increases it to $4,000. It is a precedent to be followed in the case of all others. I am opposed to it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. MORRIS demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. MORRIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved that the title be amended by adding the words "and for other purposes."

The amendment was agreed to; and the title as amended was adopted.

DESECRATION OF GRAVES.

Mr. MORRIS, from the same committee, reported back House bill No. 253, to punish for the removal of dead bodies from the grave or other place of interment in the District of Columbia, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The first section provides that every person who, in the District of Columbia, shall remove the dead body of any human being from the grave or other place of interment for the purpose of selling the same, or for the purpose of dissection, or from mere wantonness, shall, upon conviction, be punished by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by fine not exceeding $500, or both such fine and imprisonment.

The second section provides that every person who, in the District of Columbia, shall purchase or receive the dead body of any human being, knowing the same to have been disinterred, contrary to the provisions of the preceding section, shall, upon conviction, be subject to the punishment in the said section specified.

The third section provides that every person who, in the District of Columbia, shall open a grave or other place of interment, with intent, first, to remove the dead body of any human being for the purpose of selling the same or for the purpose of dissection, or, second, to steal the coffin or any part thereof, or the vestments or other articles interred with any dead body, shall, upon conviction, be punished by imprisonment not exceeding two years, or by fine not exceeding $500, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. MORRIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTION OF SENATORS, ETC.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE, from the same committee, reported adversely on House bill No. 908, to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the time and manner of holding elections for Senators in Congress," approved July 25, 1866; and the same was laid upon the table.

JUDGMENT LIENS.

Mr. COOK, from the same committee, reported adversely on a resolution to amend the law relating to judgment liens; and the same was laid upon the table.

RECORD OF DEEDS, ETC.

Mr. COOK, from the same committee, also reported adversely on a bill to enable citizens of the United States to record deeds of lands lying in States other than the States of their residence in certain cases; and the same was laid upon the table.

PART OWNERS OF FORFEITED PROPERTY.

Mr. COOK, from the same committee, also reported adversely on House bill No. 72, for the relief of loyal and innocent part owners of personal property forfeited on account of criminal acts of the part owners of it; and the same was laid upon the table.

COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. COOK, from the same committee, also reported back House bill No. 668, to limit the time for bringing suits before the Court of Claims, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill provides that every petition or proceeding before the Court of Claims to recover any claim against the United States shall be filed or commenced within six years after the passage of this act if the claim in such petition or proceeding specified shall have already accrued, and if not, then within six years after such claim shall have accrued, and not after. But the provisions of this act shall not apply when the holder of such claim shall be under twenty-one years of age, insane or a feme covert; provided that the petition or proceeding to recover such claim shall be filed or commenced within six years next after such disability shall cease to exist.

Mr. COOK. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. COOK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FEES OF OFFICERS OF UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. COOK, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back House bill No. 872, to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved February 26, 1863.

The bill was reported; and during the reading thereof the hour of one o'clock arrived, which was fixed for the execution of the order of the House in regard to absentees.

MEMBERS UNDER ARREST.

The SPEAKER. The hour of one o'clock having arrived, the Sergeant-at-Arms will now proceed to execute the order made by the House yesterday in regard to absentees from its session. The Sergeant-at-Arms will produce at the bar of the House the members in his custody.

Mr. ORTH. Mr. Speaker, the unpleasant difficulties growing out of the proceedings yesterday having been satisfactorily and honorably adjusted, I presume there is no disposition on the part of the House to pursue this subject any further. I therefore move that the warrant of the Speaker in the hands of the Sergeant-at-Arms be set aside, and that all persons arrested by virtue thereof be discharged, and on that I demand the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. The effect will be to dismiss the whole subject.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. Then I withdraw the motion.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I rise to a point of order. There are some fifty of us that have been fined.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I raise the point of order that the gentleman is under arrest, and has no right to speak. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The arrest operates from this moment; therefore the gentleman is not entitled to speak.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a question of order. Gentlemen under arrest by the Sergeant-at-Arms are in their seats in the House. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order; the Sergeant-at-Arms will present the gentlemen in his custody at the bar of the House.

Mr. LE BLOND. I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] to modify his motion by making it simply to discharge the order of the House, and that the culprits be brought to the bar of the House so that we may see who they are. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentlemen are not culprits; they are members of this House.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to know if members under arrest have a right to vote on this question.

The SPEAKER. They have not.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. For if they had they might vote down the motion.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I ask the gentleman to modify his motion by making it that they be discharged on paying the usual fee, except such of them as desire to come before the House and render their excuse.

Mr. ORTH. I accept the modification.

Mr. McRUER. I raise the point of order that they are not at the bar of the House.

The SPEAKER. They are supposed to be at the bar of the House; if not, the Sergeant-at-Arms will present them.

The Sergeant-at-Arms accordingly presented before the bar of the House the following members in his custody:

Messrs. James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Bingham, Blaine, Brandegee, Bundy, Chanler, Dawes, Deming, Griswold, Hale, Holmes, Hooper, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, Kasson, Kelley, Latham, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Marshall, Marvin, Maynard, McKee, Moorhead, Pike, Radford, John H. Rice, Ross, Sloan, Stillwell, Nathaniel G. Taylor, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Hamilton Ward, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, Stephen F. Wilson, Winfield, and Woodbridge.

The SPEAKER. The motion is that they be all discharged except those who desire to render excuses. If the motion prevails, then gentlemen who desire a separate vote will remain at the bar of the House, and the Chair will ask what excuses they have to render for being absent from the session of the House.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make an inquiry. I was never served with notice of arrest, and yet I find my name in the list of absentees under arrest. With due deference to the House, I present myself here, and I wish to know whether I am under arrest?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is under arrest and at the bar of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. FARQUHAR. I ask my colleague to yield to enable me to offer an amendment, to make an exception in the case of those who have once been before the House and fined.

Mr. ORTH. I decline to yield.

Mr. RADFORD. Have we a right to vote upon this question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman, as one of the members in custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, has not a right to vote upon this question.

The question was taken on seconding the demand for the previous question; and there were—ayes 47, noes 51.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I now move to amend the motion of my colleague [Mr. ORTH] so as to except from his proposition those who were called before the bar and fined and also those who came—

Mr. HILL. I suggest to the gentleman that he include those who got out of the House by unusual routes.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I propose to increase the fines imposed upon those who come within the terms of my amendment.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It excepts those who have not been fined; while it increases the fines upon those who have been fined. Does it propose to fine a man twice?

Mr. FARQUHAR. It is an exception in favor of those who have not been fined.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I desire to say that I do not think that any further possible good can result in continuing this prosecution, and I hope therefore that the House will put a stop to it by adopting the motion that these gentlemen be relieved from arrest and that their fines be remitted.

Mr. HIGBY. I would like to inquire what the condition of the question is?

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I will modify my motion so as to discharge them upon the payment of the usual fees.

The SPEAKER. That is the original motion.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Very well, sir; I am satisfied with that.

Mr. HIGBY. Mr. Speaker, it would be utterly impossible for this House ever to do any business unless there should be some means found of holding members here when they are brought here under arrest. It is a notorious fact that within a very few minutes after members were brought here by the Sergeant-at-Arms last evening they left the House knowing we were here in session, and yet they treated the House with utter contempt. It is impossible for us to do business otherwise, and I hope that those members who have been brought here by the Sergeant-at-Arms and have then left the House will be fined.

Mr. MORRILL. The older members of this House know that in no instance has this penalty been enforced, and that it is an utter waste of time to attempt it; and in order that there may not be another day wasted I move to lay the whole subject upon the table.

Mr. WINDOM. I raise the point of order, that when the House adjourned all the proceedings under the call fell with the adjournment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The Digest says that—

"By an adjournment pending a call all proceedings under the call are terminated; but where the House has previously passed an order especially directing otherwise, such special direction should doubtless be executed."

Mr. RAYMOND. What would be the effect of laying the whole subject upon the table?

The SPEAKER. The effect would be to relieve the members from arrest and dispose of the whole subject.

Mr. HILL. I wish to know further whether if this whole subject is laid upon the table, and these gentlemen are discharged, it will not be in effect an abandonment of the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. The House has a right to abandon its rules if it sees fit.

Mr. BOYER. I desire to inquire whether the officer who makes the arrest would not in any event receive this pay? If these fines are remitted, will they not be paid out of the contingent fund of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated, in reply to a similar inquiry last evening, that these fees are settled by law, and that that law is to be found in the statutes-at-large, volume nine.

Mr. BROMWELL. If this motion to lay upon the table prevails will not these members remain under arrest?

The SPEAKER. They will not under the usage of the House.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays on agreeing to the resolution, and called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was put upon the motion to lay the resolution upon the table; and there were—ayes 32, noes 69.

So the House refused to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I desire to call the attention of the House for a moment to the facts connected with the proposition which is now before this body for consideration. The pending proposition is to discharge all the gentlemen who are now at the bar of the House to answer for being absent without leave. I propose to amend that proposition so as to except from its operation those gentlemen who have previously been brought to the bar of the House for the same offense, and after fines had been imposed upon them again left the House without leave; and also certain other gentlemen who were present at the first call of the House, and then absented themselves without leave.

My object in offering this amendment is for the purpose of vindicating the character of the House and rendering full justice to those members who remained here for sixteen hours during yesterday and last night to maintain the integrity and dignity of this body. We were led by gentlemen of the Judiciary Committee into a contest yesterday to sustain and carry through a measure which was regarded as of importance to the country. Many of the members now at the bar of the House united with us in the effort to sustain the character of this body and carry that measure, and then they abandoned us to maintain the contest during the night. Some of those members were arrested, brought to the bar of the House, and fined for having absented themselves without leave. Yet it is proposed that they shall now, after having again been brought to the bar of the House, be discharged without even the payment of the customary fines, which we imposed upon so many members last night.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FARQUHAR. I cannot yield to the gentleman. The gentleman has justly been charged with being a deserter from his party in this struggle.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I rise to a point of order. My point of order is that the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. FARQUHAR,] who is now addressing the House, was arrested last night, brought to the bar of the House, and fined, and he has not yet paid his fine. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no information to that effect. The presumption is that every member who has been fined has paid his fine.

Mr. HIGBY. I would ask the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. INGERSOLL) how many times he was arrested and brought into this House last night?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Once; and I paid for it. [Laughter.]

Mr. FARQUHAR. It is very easy for the gentleman to rise in his place in this House and make a charge; but it is a more difficult matter for him to prove it. But it would make no difference whether I was arrested last night or not; whether I was brought to the bar of the House or not; whether I was fined or not; all that would make no difference in regard to the facts which I am endeavoring to lay before this House in relation to those members who are now derelict. I was not brought to the bar of the House and fined. But some members were fined by the votes of the very gentlemen now here before us. Sir, I insist upon it that the character and dignity of this House shall be maintained, and in doing so I ask that the distinctions shall be made which I have undertaken to set forth in the amendment which I have submitted to the House. After this House shall have vindicated its dignity, after it shall have placed upon its records proper action upon this subject, then if it chooses it can relieve these derelict members; but I am opposed to their being relieved from arrest until its judgment upon the subject shall have been placed upon the records of the House. I now yield to my colleague in front of me, [Mr. HILL.]

Mr. HILL. I do not desire to take up the time of this House unnecessarily. The facts patent to every member present are simply these: last night a large number of us were compelled to remain here and sit out the entire night. Upon looking over the gentlemen now at the bar of the House any one can see at a glance that they are nearly all old members. Now, if it is true that by being here a few sessions they have learned ways of dodging and avoiding the rules of this House and compelling other members of not so much experience to remain here hour after hour the whole night through, they themselves being quietly asleep in their beds at the time; if they can do all this and then come in here and enforce the rule upon and fine other members who were brought here in the early part of the night, then it is time that we should all understand it.

Mr. MORRILL. I rise to a question of order. I would inquire of the Chair if these members now under arrest at the bar of the House are to be required to stand there during all this discussion. If so, would it not be just that that should be reckoned in mitigation of their sentence? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. It is the order of the House that they be brought to the bar and kept there until some order shall be made in regard to them. If there is no objection they will be allowed for the present to occupy their usual seats.

Mr. HILL. If it does not relieve them from their liability I will not object.

The SPEAKER. It will not.

No objection being made, the members under arrest at the bar of the House were allowed to occupy their usual seats for the time being.

Mr. HILL. Now, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to a point of order. My point of order is that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FARQUHAR] is himself in contempt of the House, having last night slipped through the door without the permission of the Sergeant-at-Arms after the doors were ordered to be closed.

Mr. HILL. I believe there is no evidence of that before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the House has no knowledge of the fact which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] states.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I propose to prove it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the point of order comes too late. It should have been made when the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FARQUHAR] first rose to address the Chair. The Chair will state further to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] that members who have been fined are presumed to have paid their fines unless they state to the contrary. One case occurred in this House five or six years ago, where Mr. Cochrane, a member from the city of New York, being at the bar of the House, was subjected to a fine, which he in the presence of the House refused to pay. The House having this public notice of his refusal, he was not allowed to participate in the action of the House until the fine was paid. This, so far as the Chair is aware, is the only exception to the general practice. A member is supposed to obey the orders of the House; and so soon as an order has been made requiring him to pay a fine to an officer of the House, it is presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the fine is paid.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I said a moment ago that the delinquents now at the bar of the House included many of the old members, and also some gentlemen who were zealous at one time last night in moving to enforce the rules upon members who had been absent. In support of this statement, I read from the Globe of to-day:

"Mr. WENTWORTH. I demand that the Sergeant-at-Arms shall enforce the warrant of the House."

Yet the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WENTWORTH] is brought in here this morning as one of the members under arrest for violation of the rules. And these gentlemen it is proposed to excuse en masse by a wholesale, sweeping resolution, without compelling them, as other gentlemen were compelled last night, to be called out individually by name, to be published in the Globe and heralded to the country as in contempt of the House. Sir, I insist that the ordinary rule of the House, to which other gentlemen last night were compelled to submit, no matter how disagreeable it was to them, ought to be enforced now against these delinquent members. I think that this is necessary to vindicate the authority of our rules. Let us either repeal the rule in regard to the attendance of members, relieving every gentleman from the liability to such annoyance as being brought to the bar of the House to make his excuse; or else let us enforce the rule upon all alike. Do not allow it to be understood from the standing practice of this House that if members will trifle with the dignity and the rules of this body until they wear out its patience, they will be allowed to go scot-free. This is what I object to. I think that the proceeding which was carried into effect last night—the enforcement of the ordinary rule of the House—should be carried into effect this morning. For this reason I oppose the proposition of my colleague, [Mr. ORTH.] Time is precious, I admit; but when we consider how a large number of members, respecting the rules of the House, sat here all last night, during the long weary watches, answering to the roll-call time after time, while these gentlemen who are brought here this morning were sleeping comfortably in their beds, I think we should not begrudge the short time which may be necessary to enforce impartially the rules and vindicate the authority of the House.

I thank my colleague [Mr. FARQUHAR] for his courtesy in yielding me the floor to make these remarks.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I now yield the floor to my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. COBB.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FARQUHAR] has no right to retain the floor, as he is in contempt of the House, having violated its rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already overruled that point of order. It is too late to make it even if it were well founded.

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say, although knowing most of the gentlemen now at the bar of the House, all of them personally, and agreeing with most of them politically, knowing all of them as honorable members of this body, yet I feel it to be my duty to vote against the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ORTH.] which would relieve them altogether of all the penalties consequent upon their absence without leave of the House.

I will confess I am somewhat envious of these gentlemen. I am envious of the happy state of mind in which they come to the House this morning compared with that of those of us who have been here all night. Although not possessed of a large amount of currency I would give much more than they are liable to be fined if I could feel the satisfaction I believe they do. While we were here struggling for sixteen hours they were at home quietly sleeping.

But my chief object in rising is to enter my solemn protest against this proposition. As stated by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. FARQUHAR,] some of the most prominent members of this House took the initiative toward forcing action on the bill which was pending without discussion. I speak for myself and many others who sit around me when I say we did then as we have been in the habit of doing, allowed ourselves without a great amount of knowledge of the merits of the case, without investigation of the question, to be led along in the course of conduct marked out by the Judiciary Committee. When, however, we had started in that course to accomplish the result desired by that committee we found ourselves deserted; that the members of the Judiciary Committee had backed down on the issue. Now, I served under McClellan and Burnside, but I never got into the habit of retreating so as to like it. No sooner was there danger than our leader here, as McClellan and Burnside did, retreated. If that is to be the tactics of the leaders of this House I for one am about done voting for the previous question to push forward the legislation of the House, which so far as my experience has gone has ended in shameless defeat on the part of the majority of this House. That is all I wish to say.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I have but a word or two to say. I understand a motion is now pending to discharge without penalty of any kind, but on the mere payment of fees and without each one answering for himself, all these gentlemen who have been brought here under arrest. I wish it to be understood whatever others may do I will oppose it at every step. We were kept here a whole night on account of the absence of these men. We were kept here when in all human probability we would not have found it necessary to stay had they been in their places. And there are some of them, at least, who having appeared once and answered to the first and perhaps to the second call, withdrew from the House and slept quietly while others were remaining in their positions as members upon this floor.

It seems to me if this House is ever to assert its right to enforce the attendance of its members under proper proceedings it is at this time. If we are to dispense with the proceedings I do not see any reason why we should not at all times hereafter let gentlemen attend or not as it may suit their personal convenience. I do not know who the gentlemen are and cannot intend anything personal in these remarks, but let them be who they may, the more distinguished the members of this House the more important it becomes they should be made examples for the rest. If these gentlemen are to have the benefit of good suppers and sweet repose in comfortable beds, while we remain subject to the orders of the House, endeavoring to conduct its business, it is time for us to know so we may take a like advantage hereafter and stay away. I hope nothing will be done which will prevent the call of each member to assign the reason for his absence so that we may judge each case on its proper merits.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I now yield a very few moments to my colleague.

Mr. ORTH. Mr. Speaker, I think from the course matters have taken here that the object I had in view will be defeated. My object was to prevent the consumption of the time of this House in bringing before it some thirty or forty of its members, and putting them through a catechetical process in regard to their absence last night. And all this we are told is necessary in order to assert the dignity of this body. Sir, if any spectators were present yesterday long after midnight they must have come to the conclusion that some other process is necessary to be resorted to to assert and maintain our dignity. I was with my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] during the whole of the watches of the night.

Mr. SCHENCK. I wish to correct the gentleman as to his having been with me through all the watches of the night. He was one of the first lot of prisoners brought in. [Laughter.] "A fellow-feeling makes us wondrous kind."

Mr. ORTH. It does so. The gentleman has stated no new fact to the House. It is true I was absent and I answered to the call of the House and submitted to its judgment, and that was, as the gentleman from Ohio well knows at a very early hour in the evening, as early as seven o'clock. I was with him from that hour till eight o'clock this morning, and judging from our proceedings a man might readily suppose that during the whole of this time all the dignified members had left except the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] and myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I have seen since my service here several attempts at arresting members for temporary absence from this House. Your honor will recollect a scene that transpired here during the Thirty-Eighth Congress.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I rise to a point of order. Has a member a right to address the Chair as "your honor?" [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is not exactly correct.

Mr. ORTH. Well, then, I will transfer that expression from the Speaker to the gentleman from Illinois. [Laughter.] I desire to learn from the experience of the past, and I hope and trust that I have a due appreciation of what belongs to the dignity of this body.

Sir, what was my motion this morning? I am satisfied that the previous question was voted down because my proposition was not understood. What was it? It was that instead of having forty or more members arrayed before us and put through a sort of schoolboy process of answering all sorts of questions, for the purpose, no doubt, of adding to the dignity of this House—and no one is so fruitful in this mode of examination as my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK]—I desired that all the members under arrest should be discharged from custody upon payment of the usual fees. It is true the adoption of my motion would probably have robbed him [Mr. SCHENCK] and the world of those glittering witticisms with which, like lightning flashes, he has essayed from time to time to illumine this House. [Laughter.] The result of the adoption of my motion would have been to place these delinquents upon precisely the footing that all were placed last night—to discharge them upon the payment of the usual fees. But the previous question was voted down because my proposition was misunderstood by many and misrepresented by others. It was my desire simply to save time. Sir, we had been appealed to by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] and by the chairmen of various committees, who stated that the business of the House was pressing, while the hours of the session were rapidly passing away.

Mr. GRINNELL. Then why does the gentleman consume the time himself?

Mr. ORTH. The gentleman from Iowa is the last man to talk to me in regard to the consumption of time. Mr. Speaker, I supposed this whole matter could be disposed of by my motion in the short space of five or ten minutes, and the dignity of this House asserted and maintained to its fullest extent.

Under the operation of my motion the Journal of this Congress will show that some forty of its members were arrested this morning for absents themselves without leave from our deliberations; it will contain the names of the delinquents; that they were discharged by order of the House upon payment of the usual fee. Will not this record satisfy gentlemen who seem to have the dignity of the House in their special keeping? We shall, by the adoption of this course, assert our power in the preservation of our rules, save time, now so precious for more important legislation, and vindicate our dignity to at least as full an extent as it was preserved during the twenty hours of our boisterous session of yesterday. I trust the motion will prevail.

Oh, says the gentleman from Ohio, we must punish these men. What is the punishment he proposes? He and I, sir, have stood at the bar of this House as mutual delinquents and enormous fees were imposed upon us, of which he and I up to this day have never paid the first red, [laughter,] and we never will.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I will ask whether the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ORTH,] not having paid the fine imposed upon him by this House, is entitled to address the House. I make that point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order for the reason that the gentleman's fine was in reference to the first call at last evening's session, and that call was dispensed with by the House.

Mr. ORTH. I have no more to say.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I ask the House to hear my amendment as I have modified it. It excepts members fined under the first call, and also members who left the House after the first call of the House, and proposes that all those excepted shall be discharged upon the payment of double the usual fees.

Now, I desire to say but a very few words in answer to the remarks of my colleague, [Mr. ORTH.] I do not understand, nor did I at the time I moved this amendment, that it conflicted with his proposition in any manner whatever. It concedes as does his that those members of the House who have been arrested and brought to the bar of the House, and who had no knowledge of the call of the House, shall be discharged on payment of the usual fees; but it provides that those gentlemen who had been brought to the bar of the House and had been fined for their absence, and who had knowledge of the call of the House, shall be doubly fined. I refer to the men who went away from the House in the midst of the struggle to carry through this measure and abandoned us.

My amendment provides: first, that those members who had no knowledge of the call of the House shall be fined in the usual amount; and secondly, that those members shall be doubly fined who had knowledge of the call of the House, and who left the House knowingly and willfully, leaving us here to struggle, as we did, for some ten or twelve hours, who, if they had been here as they ought to have been and had stood by us, would have saved us from the mortification and humiliation of that defeat which, I acknowledge, we received from the hands of the minority this morning.

Now, having said this much, I move the previous question on the resolution and the pending amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I withdraw my amendment. I am in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ORTH.]

Mr. DELANO. What are the usual fees?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will find that in the Statutes-at-Large, volume nine, and also in the Digest.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to ask whether or not all these fees will not go into the pocket of the Sergeant-at-Arms?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has never investigated that point. It is a matter regulated by law. The rule in reference to that subject is to be found on page 176 of the Digest.

The question being on Mr. FARQUHAR's amendment, it was put; and there were—ayes 54, noes 43.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred upon the resolution as amended; and being put, said resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MOULTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Any gentleman who has been arrested and who desires to make excuse and have a separate vote on his case, will now present himself at the bar to make that excuse.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee. I do, sir.

The SPEAKER. Mr. TAYLOR, you have been absent from the sessions of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer for that absence?

Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I would state in vindication of myself that I am in the habit of attending very closely to my duties in this House. But for the last six weeks from one to three of my family have been sick. During that time I have lost a great deal of sleep and have given a great deal of attention to those that are sick. Under these circumstances I paired off with my colleague, Mr. MAYNARD, about five or six o'clock yesterday evening, not anticipating a long session of the House. I say this in justification of myself.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I move that the gentleman be excused without payment of fees.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I would suggest that the excuse should not occupy more than one minute in its statement.

The SPEAKER. No limitation of time can be imposed except by unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I merely desired to make the suggestion.

Mr. BALDWIN, one of the absentees, presented himself at the bar of the House.

The SPEAKER. Mr. BALDWIN, you have been absent from the sessions of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to render for having been thus absent?

Mr. BALDWIN. My only excuse is this: for some considerable time past I have been troubled with a very severe inflammation of the throat, and my physician has recommended me not to go out of doors at night. For that reason yesterday I went home before the night came on.

Mr. MILLER. I move that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BALDWIN] be discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms without the payment of the usual fees.

The motion was agreed to.

No other of the absentees appeared at the bar to render an excuse for being absent without leave.

HON. JOHN H. FARQUHAR.

Mr. KASSON. I arise to a question of privilege, and offer for consideration at the present time the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Hon. Mr. FARQUHAR, a member of this House, from Indiana, having during its last session forced his way into this House without its permission during a call of the House, and after the doors had been closed by its order, be taken into custody by the Sergeant-at-Arms and brought to the bar of the House, to abide its order in respect to his contempt of its rules.

Mr. UPSON. The resolution assumes that which is not in evidence before this body.

Mr. KASSON. I charge the facts so to be upon direct information. Now, I wish to say that I regard myself, as well as the other culprits presented at the bar of the House with such extraordinary stringency this morning, as having a valid excuse for leaving the House at a very late hour last night, being unable to remain here without very great personal discomfort from physical prostration and fatigue. But I do not and did not present that excuse this morning; nor will I deny that my physical strength might have sustained me here through the entire session of yesterday. But when the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FARQUHAR] gets up on this floor and with a voice that resounds throughout the Hall and the galleries of this Chamber, demands a vindication of the dignity and rules of this House, I cannot resist the inclination to call the attention of the House to the fact that there has been a violation of its rules committed by the gentleman from Indiana himself, much greater than passing out of the doors of this Hall after they have been opened.

By an order of this House, under proceedings instituted under a call of the House, the doors of this Hall were closed. I, with others, sat here continually from early morning until late at night for the purpose of getting on with the business. I sat at my desk here, working at intervals on matters connected with business before my committee. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FARQUHAR] was absent from the House without its leave. After the doors had been closed for the purpose of ascertaining who were within the Hall to aid in the transaction of the business of the House, and who were absent from its sessions without its leave, my friend from Indiana, instead of waiting for the order of the House to have its doors again opened, when he would have been brought in here by the Sergeant-at-Arms, "forced his way in," as one gentleman says, "slipped in," as another says, and thus evaded the responsibility which the rules of the House imposed upon him.

Now, I took the whole responsibility of absents myself last night, and when proceedings under the call were suspended at ten or eleven o'clock, and the doors were opened to everybody, I availed myself of the opportunity to retire and refresh my exhausted physical energies by getting something to eat.

Now, under these circumstances, I say it hardly lies in the mouth of my eloquent friend from Indiana [Mr. FARQUHAR] to demand a vindication of the dignity of this House and the observance of its rules by members. Let the responsibility rest where it belongs; but let not those who have themselves violated the rules of the House rise here and demand that those who from physical necessity left the House through the open doors shall be brought to its bar and subjected to the action of the House.

Now, sir, I am of course ready to yield the floor to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. FARQUHAR,] if he desires to show cause why he should not present himself at the bar of the House. Otherwise I shall move the previous question.

Mr. FARQUHAR rose.

Mr. KASSON. I yield to the gentleman, retaining my right to the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] will allow me to suggest that, in presenting this resolution, he is asking the House to vote an affirmation of facts of which it knows nothing.

Mr. KASSON. It will know in a moment.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know whether it will or not.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that if I have been arrested by the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House I am prepared to go in custody of that officer to the bar of the House to answer any charge that may be made against me. Sir, I ask the gentleman from Iowa whether he makes the charge against me or against the Sergeant-at-Arms for dereliction of duty. If the Sergeant-at-Arms arrested me why was I not brought to the bar of the House? If I was in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms I am ready to appear at the bar.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. FARQUHAR. I do not yield to the gentleman now.

Mr. KASSON. I thought the gentleman asked me a question, and I wished to answer it.

Mr. FARQUHAR. The gentleman from Iowa rises in his seat and prefers charges against me—that I have been absent from the House without leave; that I have been arrested by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and that afterward I forced myself into the House in violation of its order. Sir, I deny this utterly. I appeal to the record to show whether I have ever been arrested by the Sergeant-at-Arms or have ever forced my way into this House. If I am not misinformed the records of this House show that on the first call last night I was present. I was absent from the House when the doors were closed; but I came here voluntarily, without being arrested. I came here seeking to take my seat. I came to that door, and the Doorkeeper informed me that I could not come in. I demanded it as my right to come into the Hall of the House of Representatives. [Laughter.]

Gentlemen will please hold a little while. When I shall have stated the case they will understand it. I am pleased, Mr. Speaker, that I am enabled to so edify and delight the distinguished gentlemen around me as to bring out such a burst of laughter when I tell them that I came to the door of the House and sought to come to my seat. I was informed by the Doorkeeper that the doors were closed, and that if I attempted to come in I might bring them into trouble. I turned away pleasantly, and they sent word to the Speaker, when the Sergeant-at-Arms stepped out and informed me that he had no warrant for me, invited me to my seat, and assured me that my record was all right. Now, sir, if that officer arrested me why was I not brought to the bar? He did not arrest me. I appeal to the Sergeant-at-Arms; I appeal to the record. Sir, I never flinch from any proper responsibility. If I am amenable to this House I am ready to go to its bar and answer.

But, sir, whatever may be the fact in regard to that matter, is that any reason why I should not rise in my seat and call the attention of the House to the facts with regard to the gentlemen who have been before its bar to-day? I have done this as a matter of duty. I have not done it for the purpose of mulcting these gentlemen, toward each of whom I entertain the kindest personal feelings, for the amount of their fines, because I know that they will never be required to pay them. I have done it, as I before remarked, that the matter might go upon the records of the House as a precedent for the future. It was for this purpose, and this purpose alone, that I took the floor to move my amendment. If I am amenable to the House I am ready to go before its bar at any time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he has no recollection of having received any message from any of those gentlemen who were in arrest for absence from the House without leave.

Mr. GRINNELL. The gentleman from Indiana utterly denies the charge set forth in the resolution, and I make the point of order, therefore, that the resolution is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order, as that is a matter for the House to determine.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman from Indiana so far from denying has admitted the charge.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I deny that I forced my way into the House.

Mr. KASSON. Why, there is not any question of the fact. It is proved by his own declaration. Is it not correctly incorporated in the resolution that he forced his way into the House?

Mr. FARQUHAR. No, sir.

Mr. KASSON. I will not force the House on that. His declaration now made is that when he appeared at the door the door was closed, and he was told that he could not come in. Afterward he appeared again and the Sergeant-at-Arms stepped out. What that means I have no power to say; but the gentleman from Indiana came in, and neither the Sergeant-at-Arms nor any other man had the right to revoke the order of the House closing the door. It was impossible for a member lawfully to come in after the doors were closed unless under the order that the Sergeant-at-Arms shall bring him in.

When thirty or forty members were this morning at the bar the gentleman was very willing and anxious that the full penalty should be imposed. If he puts the yoke upon our necks let him then gracefully bear it himself. I charge that the gentleman entered after the door was closed; that is the charge in the resolution, and he does not deny it.

One more word. He says that he has not been under arrest. I presume no one of the forty who were at the bar this morning was under arrest. The Sergeant-at-Arms came to my desk and said he had my name on his list, and then went away. That is an arrest by the common consent of the House; and when the gentleman was arrested he could not come into the House except on the order of the Sergeant-at-Arms. He could not have come in under the permission of the Speaker. The Speaker would not have granted it, for it would have been unjust to others. I say he had no right to come in. He said the Sergeant-at-Arms did not bring him in, and that is the only way he could come in. If that is not forcing one's way into the House in violation of its rules I do not know what is.

Mr. ORTH. Mr. Speaker, we are told "blessed are the peacemakers." I find myself now occupying precisely the same position before the House in regard to my colleague [Mr. FARQUHAR] which I occupied this morning in regard to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.] I understand the resolution of the gentleman from Iowa charges that my colleague forced his way into this House. I understand, furthermore, that my colleague does deny the charge contained in the resolution of my friend from Iowa. I hope, therefore, he will not ask for its adoption at the present time. What I ask of my friend from Iowa is, that the mercy shown to him he ought to show to others.

My colleague denies the fact stated in every particular; and I ask the gentleman from Iowa whether, under this state of things, before proceeding to ask for the adoption of his resolution, it would not be better that the resolution should be referred to a select committee to examine and report on the facts?

Mr. KASSON. I think the facts already sufficiently appear to the House. At any rate, whatever facts the gentleman has he can state at the bar of the House in answer to the resolution. I say that is the place, at the bar of the House, for him to make his statement, and not here, in answer to the charge that he forced himself into the House. When he has made his statement he will be treated perhaps like all the others. That is all. He knows this is done in as good temper as anything which has been done this morning.

Mr. UPSON. The Journal shows that the gentleman answered to the roll-call, and he therefore cannot be held to be in contempt of the House.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. ROSS. I would inquire of the Chair whether the effect of this will be, if adopted, to prevent the gentleman from Indiana from practicing in the courts of the United States? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it will not. Mr. STEVENS. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was not agreed to—ayes 61, noes 65.

Mr. ORTH. I would inquire, if the House refuse to second the previous question, whether it will not then be in order to move to refer the resolution to a select or standing committee?

The SPEAKER. It would be.

The previous question was seconded—ayes 74, noes 41.

Mr. LYNCH. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

The main question was ordered on the adoption of the resolution—ayes 81, noes 35.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. MORRILL. I withdraw the motion if it is to be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I renew it.

Mr. ORTH. And on it I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 102, nays 48, not voting 41; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Boutwell, Broomall, Buckland, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cooper, Cullom, Darling, Deffrees, Delano, Deming, Denison, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Eliot, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hawkins, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Hise, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Kerr, Ketcham, Kountz, Kykendall, Laffin, Le Bond, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, McClurg, McIndoe, McKee, McRuer, Mercer, Miller, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Niblack, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Phelps, Pomeroy, Price, Samuel J. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rogers, Rollins, Sawyer, Scofield, Shellabarger, Starr, Stevens, Stokes, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Francis Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, and James F. Wilson—102.

NAYS—Messrs. Bergen, Bingham, Boyer, Brandegee, Bromwell, Campbell, Dawes, Dawson, Farnsworth, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Griswold, Aaron Harding, Hogan, Holmes, Hooper, Edwin N. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hunter, Jenckes, Kasson, Latham, George V. Lawrence, Leftwich, Marshall, Marvin, Maynard, Moorhead, Nicholson, Piko, Plants, Radford, Raymond, Ritter, Ross, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Stillwell, Taber, Thornton, Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, William B. Washburn, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Woodbridge—48.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Baldwin, Blaine, Blow, Bundy, Sidney Clarke, Conkling, Culver, Davis, Dixon, Farquhar, Firee, Harris, Hart, Henderson, Asabel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, Johnson, Jones, William Lawrence, Marston, McCullough, Newell, Noell, William H. Randall, Rousseau, Schenck, Spalding, Strouse, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Van Aernam, Andrew H. Ward, Hamilton Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Whaley, and Wright—41.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I now move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cook] is entitled to the floor on the consideration of business which was interrupted at one o'clock by a question of privilege. He is entitled to the remainder of the morning hour.

RECORDING OF VOTES.

Mr. HISE. I ask the privilege of having my vote recorded on the bill which was before the House yesterday and this morning relating to the test oath.

The SPEAKER. The rule, to be found on page 192 of the Digest, adopted several years ago, forbids the Speaker entertaining such a proposition, even by unanimous consent, after the result of the vote has been announced. It can only be done by suspending the rules on Monday.

OFFICERS OF UNITED STATES COURTS—AGAIN.

The House resumed the consideration of House bill No. 872, to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed clerks, marshals, and attorneys of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved February 26, 1853.

Mr. COOK. I move to amend the bill by inserting after $2,000, in the second paragraph of the first section, the words "per annum, including fees and emoluments received for services rendered by deputies."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COOK. I move to strike out section two, as follows:

That as part of the compensation before allowed, there shall hereafter be paid to each and every United States marshal for each and every day of the year a per diem compensation of five dollars, subject to no contingency whatever except removal from office, by death or otherwise.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That when the entire compensation of any marshal, including the fees and emoluments received for services rendered by deputy, shall be less than $2,000 per annum, the difference, to be ascertained and allowed by the proper accounting officer of the Treasury, shall be paid to him therefrom.

Mr. O'NEILL. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cook] to the second section of this bill, and to ask him whether the change proposed in that section will be likely to increase the salary of the United States marshal for the eastern district of Pennsylvania? I merely want to know, for I do not want the salary of that official increased. I move now to strike out section four of the bill, which is as follows:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the clerks and bailiffs of the courts of the United States appointed in pursuance of the act to which this is an amendment, shall be allowed the sum of three dollars per day, to be paid by and included in the accounts of the marshal, out of any money of the United States in his hands. The compensation to be given only for actual attendance; and when both courts are in session at one time to be paid but for attendance on one court.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That in lieu of the compensation now allowed to the clerks and bailiffs of the circuit and district courts of the United States held in the cities of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, New Orleans, and San Francisco by the sixth section of the act of Congress entitled "An act to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed clerks, marshals, and attorneys in the circuit and district courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved February 26, 1853, the clerks and bailiffs of said courts shall be allowed and paid for their services the sum of $940, to be paid by and included in the accounts of the marshal out of any money in his hands.

The object of my amendment is to change the phraseology of the law. These officials are now entitled only to so much per diem for an actual day's attendance, and so far as the district and circuit courts in Pennsylvania and New York are concerned these officials are actually in attendance almost every day. But on account of the change in prices, and the increased amount of duties imposed upon these men, I propose that they shall have a permanent salary of $940 per annum.

Mr. COOK. I move to recommit the bill with the amendments to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COOK. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommended.

The motion was entered.

RETIREMENT OF TREASURY NOTES.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from the further consideration of joint resolution of the House, No. 240, suspending the cancellation or retirement of legal-tender Treasury notes for the term of two years, and the same was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

JURIES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, bill of the House No. 901, to regulate the selection of juries for the several courts of the District of Columbia.

The bill was read. It provides that all grand and petit jurors to serve either in the criminal, circuit, or district courts, in and for the District of Columbia, shall be selected and designated in such manner and at such times as the judges of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, or a majority of the judges thereof, may determine: provided that the persons so designated shall be citizens of the United States, resident within said District, and shall be returned as the said judges may direct upon writs of venire facias. And when, by reason of challenge or other cause, there shall not be a sufficient grand or petit jury, the marshal or his deputy shall, by order of the court wherein such defect of jurors shall happen, return jurymen de talibus circumstantibus sufficient to supply such defect; but in case the marshal and his deputy are interested in the event of the cause, or not indifferent, the jurors aforesaid may be returned by such disinterested person as the court shall appoint; and to which person the court shall first administer an oath or affirmation that he will truly and impartially make such returns.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I demand the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

VACANCY IN PRESIDENTIAL OFFICE.

Mr. BOUTWELL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with an amendment, House bill No. 2, to amend the act declaring the officer who shall act as President of the United States in case of vacancies in the office both of the President and Vice President, approved March 1, 1792, with a recommendation that the same do pass.

The bill was read. It provides that in case of removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the President and Vice President of the United States, the President of the Senate pro tempore, and in case there shall be no President of the Senate then the Speaker of the House of Representatives for the time being, and in case there shall be no Speaker of the House of Representatives then the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, and in case there shall be no Chief Justice then the justice of the Supreme Court of the United States who shall have been longest commissioned, shall act as President of the United States until the disability be removed or a President shall be elected.

The amendment reported from the committee was to add to the bill the following sections:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever the offices of President and Vice President shall both become vacant, the Secretary of State shall, if the Senate and House of Representatives by concurrent resolution so request and direct, forthwith cause a notification thereof to be made to the Executives of every State, and shall also cause the same to be published in at least one of the newspapers printed in each State, specifying that electors of President and Vice President shall be chosen in the several States within thirty-four days preceding the first Wednesday in the December then next ensuing: Provided, There shall be a space of two months between the date of such notification and the said first Wednesday in December. But if there shall not be the space of two months between the date of such notification and the said first Wednesday in December, or if the term for which the President and Vice President last in office were elected shall not expire on the 3d day of March next ensuing, then the Secretary of State shall specify in the notification that the electors shall be chosen within thirty-four days preceding the first Wednesday in December of the year then next ensuing, within which time the electors shall accordingly be chosen, and the electors shall meet and give their votes on the said first Wednesday in December; and the proceedings and duties of the said electors and others shall be pursuant to the directions prescribed by law.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever the offices of President and Vice President shall both become vacant when Congress is not in session, it shall be the duty of the officer discharging the duties and powers of the office of President forthwith to issue a proclamation convening both Houses of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. CULLOM. Is it the design of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] to put this bill upon its passage at this time?

Mr. BOUTWELL. That is for the members of the House to determine.

Mr. HALE. I perceive that the Committee on the Judiciary have gone back to the old law and provided for the choosing of electors within thirty-four days preceding the first Wednesday in December. For some years past we have had a law fixing the Tuesday after the first Monday in November. I would suggest to the gentleman the propriety of adopting that language in this bill.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will briefly explain the provisions of this bill as proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary to be amended. It changes the succession in case of vacancies in the offices both of President and of Vice President by adding to the offices named in the existing law on whom the office of President would devolve, first the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States; and secondly, the associate justice of the Supreme Court whose commission shall be the oldest. Those are the only changes made in regard to the succession.

The existing law provides that whenever vacancies shall occur in the offices, both of President and Vice President, the Secretary of State shall issue his order—there is no discretion whatever vested in him—his order to the Executives of the several States, and an election for President must take place. There are no lawful means by which the election can then be avoided.

Now, the Committee on the Judiciary have examined the matter in reference to whether it is possible by law to provide for the election of President and Vice President to fill out the term for which the President and Vice President last elected were originally elected. I believe the committee are unanimously of the opinion that there is no power in Congress to pass a law to fill the vacancy by an election. If an election takes place under the existing law it must be for four years from the 4th day of the March next ensuing the day of election.

The objection to the existing law is this: the presidential term covers two Congresses. If a vacancy should occur at any time during the term of President and Vice President there are no means by which an election by the people can be avoided; and the persons elected would hold their offices for four years from the 4th day of the next March. As the vacancy may occur during the first year of a Congress, it will be seen that the symmetry of our Government, as shown by the presidential and congressional terms, will be in danger of injury, and there will be no power by legislative action to restore the Government to its original harmony.

Now, sir, the bill proposes to change the law in this particular; it provides that whenever a vacancy shall occur in the office of President and Vice President during the recess of Congress it shall be the duty of the person performing the duties of the office of President to convene immediately both Houses of Congress. Then it is made the duty of the Secretary of State to issue warrants for an election, if he shall be required and directed so to do by a concurrent resolution of the two Houses of Congress. The effect will be to render it optional with the Congress of the United States to determine that there shall be an election, or to leave the executive department of the Government to be administered until the commencement of the next regular term by the officer who may be discharging the duties of the office.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman, I think, fails to appreciate the particular point to which I sought to call his attention. The old law in regard to the election of electors of President and Vice President provided that the electors should be appointed within thirty-four days preceding the first Wednesday in December. By the present law a specific day has been fixed—the Tuesday following the first Monday in November. This bill follows, in this respect, the provision of the old law. I suggest that it ought to be amended so as to conform to the present practice, by fixing the Tuesday after the first Monday of November as the day of election.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I should not object to that, although no action of the committee has been had in regard to that point. We left it according to the provision of the old law, supposing that the Secretary of State, under the direction of Congress, would designate some day within the limits specified. The committee thought it might be wise to allow him that discretion.

Mr. HALE. I would suggest to the gentleman that under the construction given to the old law, that discretion would reside with the States, and not with the Secretary of State.

Mr. BOUTWELL. With the consent of the House I will amend the bill so as to correspond with the existing law, in accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE.]

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strikes out the words "within thirty-four days preceding the first Wednesday in December" and insert in lieu thereof the words "the Tuesday after the first Monday."

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill will be so amended.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, this bill is of more importance than many members are probably aware. According to the explanation which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] has given, it authorizes the Congress of the United States to determine whether a presidential election shall be held or not in case of a vacancy in the office of both President and Vice President. The result would be, that if a President and Vice President should die in the early part of the term, and the office should devolve upon a person who suited the views of Congress there would be no election; while if the person upon whom the office devolved was not satisfactory to the political opinions of Congress an election would be ordered. In other words, the bill proposes to allow Congress to control the whole question of whether a new election shall be held or not in case of the death of the President and Vice President. The taking away of this power from the people and lodging it with Congress may be productive of difficulty in the future. The real question—and it is one which ought to be fairly and fully considered—is whether by positive law the right should not be secured to the people of expressing, in case of the death of the President and Vice President, their preference as to who should occupy the presidential office. The Constitution of the United States designates the Vice President to fill the office in case of a vacancy; but it goes no farther. All those who vote for President and Vice President understand perfectly well that in case of the death of the President the Vice President shall serve for the residue of the term. But no implication of the Constitution suggests that in case of the death of both President and Vice President the people shall be deprived of the right of deciding by their ballots who shall represent them as President for the remainder of the term.

Looking to the importance of that one point it strikes me this bill should be set down for some day when it may be discussed. I do not think this House is ready to adopt it at once.

I have no objection to the details of the bill. I think some law should be passed providing for the holding of an election to supply the vacancy occasioned by the death of the President and Vice President. It is an important matter and the people should be consulted, and the House should be consulted whether they will give to Congress, taking it away from the people, the power to say who will represent them in case of the death of the President and Vice President.

Mr. JENCKES. The act as drawn is based on the act of 1792, while the amendment suggested by the gentleman from New York is made to conform to existing law, and there is still retained the provision of the first Wednesday of December, instead of the time required by law, which is the second Wednesday in February. And there is no provision in this bill for the administration of the duties of President between the day the result is declared and the 4th of March following. It seems to me from a hasty glance to be imperfect. I do not suppose it is the intention to alter the commencement of the term.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The committee is of opinion whenever there is an election for President or Vice President that election is for the term of four years.

Mr. JENCKES. I agree that it is the commencement of a new term of four years. It is the intention to have the term commence on the 4th of March. The mode of counting the votes is the same as under the law, but there is no time prescribed when the President shall take the oath of office.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If the bill be ordered to be printed and postponed as in the morning hour I shall not object.

Mr. JENCKES. Let it be recommitted with a motion pending to reconsider.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move that the bill and amendments be printed, and that they be committed to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I now enter a motion to reconsider.

J. ROSS BROWNE'S REPORT.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution, and demanded the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House five thousand extra copies of the report of J. Ross Browne on the mineral resources of the country.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. LAFLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FIRE-ARMS, ETC.

The SPEAKER laid before the House two communications from the Secretary of War, one respecting contracts for fire-arms made since April, 1864, and the other respecting small-arms fabricated at the Springfield armory and purchased elsewhere; which were laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

TENNESSEE CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of privilege, and call up the following resolution:

Resolved, That Dorsey B. Thomas, contesting the right of Hon. Samuel M. Arnell to a seat in this House as a Representative from the sixth congressional district of Tennessee, be, and he is hereby, required to serve upon the said Arnell, within eight days after the passage of this resolution, a particular statement of the grounds of said contest; and that said Arnell be, and he is hereby, required to serve upon said Thomas his answer thereto in eight days thereafter, and that both parties be allowed eighteen days, next after the service of said answer, to take testimony in support of their several allegations and denials in all other respects in conformity to the requirements of the act of February 19, 1851, except that not more than four days' notice shall be required for the taking of any deposition under this resolution.

Mr. Speaker, if these parties desire to go on with their contest they will conform to this resolution. I do not think there is any penalty attached to it. It is in the ordinary form, and the contestant is required to do this if he is to go on with the contest.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAWES in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of House bill No. 918, making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868.

By unanimous consent the first reading of the bill was dispensed with, and the Clerk proceeded to read the bill by sections for amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I am instructed by the committee to move to amend section two by inserting after the clause "for the mail steamship service between San Francisco, Japan, and China, $500,000," the following proviso:

Provided, That so much of the act of Congress approved February 17, 1865, authorizing said service, as requires the said steamships to touch at Honolulu, in the Sandwich Islands, shall be, and the same is hereby, repealed; upon the express condition, however, that the contractors for said steamship service shall enter into contract to the satisfaction of the Postmaster General, agreeing to establish within five months from the passage of this act, in lieu of said service released, a branch line of steamship service carrying the United States mails between the port in Japan used by the main line of steamships and the port of Shanghai, making continuous regular trips connecting with the main line, both on the outward and homeward voyages, under the direction of the Postmaster General, which services shall be performed by first-class American sea-going steamships, and without additional charge to the United States.

Mr. CHANLER. I suggest to the chairman of the committee that this amendment may perhaps not be sufficiently definite to cover the object which the committee have in view, which I think is a good one. I do not think the term "American steamship" is sufficient. I think that the words "built and owned in the United States" should be added. I make this suggestion in good faith.

Mr. STEVENS. We have used here the usual term, and not only that, but we sent the amendment itself to the company, and it was thoroughly examined and approved by them.

Mr. CHANLER. Very well, I only thought it might have been an omission.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SLOAN. I move to amend the bill on page 2.

The CHAIRMAN. It would not be in order, that portion of the bill having been passed.

Mr. SLOAN. I raise the question of order that the bill was read through before gentlemen were able to find it on their printed files.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. SLOAN. Another point of order. The bill has not been read by sections for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The first reading was dispensed with by unanimous consent, so the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. SLOAN. I ask unanimous consent to move an amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. I object.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DAWES reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the special order, being bill of the House No. 918, making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, had made an amendment thereto, and had directed him to report the same to the House.

Mr. STEVENS. I call the previous question on the bill and amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. SLOAN. I move that the bill and pending amendment be laid on the table.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. SLOAN. I call the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

The amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. STEVENS. I call the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. KASSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SMALL-ARMS.

Mr. PRICE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That five hundred copies of the communication from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of this House in reference to small-arms, be printed for the use of the members of the House.

THE MILITIA.

Mr. BAKER. I ask unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be instructed to inquire whether the public interests require any modification of the statute of February 28, 1795, entitled "An act to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, and to repeal the act now in force for those purposes;" and particularly whether any change should be made as to the first section of said act, and that said committee be empowered to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I object.

And then, on motion of Mr. CULLOM, (at thirty-five minutes past three o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday, but before concluding was interrupted by Mr. CONNESS. I move that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can only be dispensed with by the unanimous consent of the Senate. The Chair hears no objection, and the further reading is dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WADE. I hold in my hand nineteen petitions from various parts of Ohio, setting forth that in the belief of the petitioners the tariff bill agreed upon by the joint committee of wool-growers and manufacturers, and which passed the House of Representatives at the last session, was fair toward all other interests and afforded no more than a just and reasonable protection to the wool and woollen interests of the country, and therefore praying for its immediate passage into a law. As that subject is now pending before the Senate, I move that these petitions be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WADE. I have also another petition of the same character precisely from the county of Lake, Ohio, signed I believe by more than a thousand petitioners, praying for the passage of the House tariff bill of the last session; which I move take the same direction.

The petition was ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. WILSON presented three petitions of officers of the United States Army, praying for an increase of pay; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented the petition of Samuel T. Atkinson, praying for compensation for services rendered as assistant assessor of internal revenue in the first collection district of South Carolina; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented an additional paper in relation to the claim of Thomas E. Dudley, for services rendered as assistant assessor in the first collection district of South Carolina; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LANE presented three memorials of citizens of Indiana, remonstrating against the passage of any law authorizing the curtailment of the national currency, or a return within a limited time to specie payments, and against compelling all national banks to redeem their notes in New York, or prohibiting them from paying or receiving interest on bank balances; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORRILL presented the petition of Harriet W. Pond, praying to be remunerated for money expended and services rendered by her in taking care of sick and wounded soldiers; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BUCKALEW presented a petition of naturalized citizens and immigrants who have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, residing in Clinton county, Pennsylvania, praying for an amendment to the act to regulate the elective franchise in the District of Columbia, so as to put all white men who have declared their intention of becoming citizens and residents of the District of Columbia upon an equal footing with the negroes, and to extend to them the same privileges enjoyed by negroes; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. KIRKWOOD presented the petition of Hiram W. Johnson, of Johnson county, Iowa, praying for compensation for losses alleged to have been sustained by him by reason of the occupation of certain land in Arkansas by United States troops, he having leased the same of Mr. Mellen, special agent of the Treasury Department; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 217) to allow members of Congress to inspect papers in the Post Office Department, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. WADE, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 501) amendatory of an act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Montana, approved May 26, 1864, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 523) to provide for the registration of electors in the Territories of the United States, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. WILLEY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Ethan N. Jenks, late a captain in the seventh regiment of Rhode Island volunteers, praying for allowances for pay for certain services from May 4 to September 9, 1863, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 531), for the relief of Ethan N. Jenks, late a captain in the seventh regiment of Rhode Island volunteers. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. VAN WINKLE, from the Committee on Finance, to whom were referred the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. No. 90) to suspend temporarily the collection of the direct tax within the State of West Virginia, reported in favor of concurring in the amendments of the House, with amendments.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a motion to print a memorial of the merchants, manufacturers, mechanics, and others, of the city of Baltimore, remonstrating against the passage of the bankrupt bill, have instructed me to report it back and ask to be discharged from its further consideration, under the general rule the committee have adopted not to print memorials unless there be some special reason for it.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 896) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1868, reported it with amendments.

PROSECUTIONS FOR SMUGGLING.

Mr. MORRILL. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 625) supplementary to an act to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes, approved July 18, 1866, have instructed me to report it back with a recommendation that it pass, and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection; the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that the act to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes, approved July 18, 1866, shall be so construed as not to affect any right of suit or prosecution which may have accrued under any prior acts of Congress repealed or supplied by that act previous to July 18, 1866, and that all such suits or prosecutions as have been or shall be commenced under prior laws for acts committed previous to July 18, 1866, shall be tried and disposed of and judgment and decree executed as if the act of July 18, 1866 had not been passed, anything therein contained to the contrary notwithstanding.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. MORRILL. Perhaps I ought to explain what this bill means before it is passed, and I shall do so in a single word. It is simply to supply an omission in the act of July 18, 1866. I will read the forty-fourth section of that act:

SEC. 44. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of this act shall not be deemed to affect any action or proceeding or indictment pending at the time this act shall take effect; but the same shall be tried and disposed of, and judgment or decree executed as if this act had not been passed.

The previous section repeals all the acts which were supplied by the act of July 18, 1866—repeals them absolutely—and this section saves the remedy where the actions had already been commenced. It will be seen, however, by the general repealing clause, that all causes of action were not saved unless process had been actually commenced. This bill is to supply that omission.

The bill was passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. STEWART asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 532) for the relief of the inhabitants of cities and towns upon the public lands; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 533) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Washington Temperance Society of the city of Washington," approved July 27, 1866; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WADE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 534) to provide for the allotment of the members of the Supreme Court among the circuits, and for the appointment of marshals for the Supreme Court and for the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

OFFICERS OF NEW REGIMENTS.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate whether any of the officers appointed under the provisions of the act to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States, approved July 28, 1866, have not joined their regiments or stations, and if so, to report their names, rank, and the regiment to which they have been assigned, together with the reasons why they have not reported for duty as ordered.

The following bills were read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, namely:

A bill (H. R. No. 668) to limit the time for bringing suits before the Court of Claims.

A bill (H. R. No. 1038) providing for an additional term of the circuit court of the United States in the eastern district of Arkansas, and for other purposes.

RAILROADS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. CONNESS. I move to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 461.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 461) to aid in the construction of the San Francisco Central Pacific railroad was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length.

Mr. CONNESS. There is a complete substitute for the bill reported by the Committee on Public Lands, and I hope the substitute alone will be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee to whom this bill was referred have reported an amendment, which is to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert other matter. Only the words proposed to be inserted will be read, unless some Senator asks for the reading of the original bill.

The Secretary read the words proposed to be inserted, as follows:

That the right of way through the public lands be, and the same is hereby, granted to the State of California, in trust for the San Francisco Central Pacific Railroad Company, or for the California Pacific Railroad Company, corporations existing under the laws of the State of California, to construct either of the roads hereinafter named, and for the successors and assigns of that one of said companies as shall have first complied with the terms of this act, and shall first complete such road, for the construction of a railroad from the city of Sacramento, or Marysville, or from both of said points, through the counties of Yuba, Sutter, Yolo, and Solano, to a point at or near the city of Benicia or Vallejo, in the last-named county, in said State; and the right is hereby given to that one of said corporations as shall first comply with the terms of this act to take from the public lands adjacent to the line of such railroad material for the construction thereof; said right of way is granted to such railroad to the extent of one hundred feet in width on each side of such road where it may pass over the public lands; also all necessary grounds for station buildings, depots, machine-shops, switches, side-tracks, turn-tables, and water stations.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That there be, and is hereby, granted to the State of California, to aid in the construction of that one of the above-mentioned railroads as shall be first completed according to the terms of this act, and to secure the safe and speedy transportation of mails, troops, munitions of war, and public stores over the route of said line of railway, every alternate section of public land designated by odd numbers to the amount of ten alternate sections per mile on each side of said railroad line as said company may adopt, wherever in the line thereof the United States have full title thereto respectively; but in case it shall appear that the United States have, when the line or route of said road is definitely fixed, sold any section or any part thereof granted as aforesaid, or that the right of preemption, homestead settlement, or other private right has attached, or that the same has been reserved by the United States, then it shall be lawful for any agent or agents, to be appointed by the Governor of said State, to select, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, from the lands of the United States (to which no right has attached and not being within the limits of any reservation as aforesaid) nearest to the tiers of sections above specified, so much land in alternate sections or parts of sections as shall be equal to such lands as have been sold, reserved, or otherwise appropriated, or to which the right of preemption or homestead settlement has attached, as aforesaid; which lands shall be held and disposed of by the State of California for the use and purpose aforesaid: Provided, That the lands to be so located shall in no case be further than twenty-five miles from the line of said road: Provided further, That the lands hereby granted shall be exclusively applied to the construction of said railroad for and on account of which the said lands are hereby granted, and shall be disposed of only as the work progresses, and the same shall be applied to no other purpose whatsoever: Provided further, That any and all lands heretofore reserved to the United States by any act of Congress, or in any other manner by competent authority, are hereby reserved from the operations of this act except so far as it may be found necessary to locate the route of said road through such reserved lands, in which case the right of way only to the extent of one hundred feet wide shall be granted, subject to the approval of the President of the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever the surveyor general of the United States for the State of California shall first certify to the Secretary of the Interior that such railroad is completed from Sacramento city or Marysville, or from both of said points, to a point at or near Benicia or Vallejo, in a good and substantial manner, and in all respects as required by this act, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to transfer to the Governor of said State all the lands granted as aforesaid.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said railroad shall be constructed in a substantial and workmanlike manner, with all the necessary drains, culverts, bridges, viaducts, crossings, turnouts, and watering places, and all other appurtenances, including furniture and rolling stock, equal in all respects to railroads of the first-class when prepared for business; the gauge to be the same as the Central Pacific railroad.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That as soon as the lines of said roads shall be surveyed and located the Governor of said State shall cause a map of the location to be filed with the Secretary of the Interior, who thereupon shall cause the lands not already surveyed within twenty miles of the line of said location, to be surveyed, and the odd sections and parts of sections not occupied by homestead settlements, or otherwise legally disposed of, to be set apart for the purposes contemplated by this act; and the sections and parts of sections of land which by the aforesaid grant shall remain in the United States, within ten miles on each side of said road, shall not be sold for less than double the minimum price of public lands when sold.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That each and every grant, right, and privilege herein are so made and given to said State for the purposes aforesaid upon and subject to the following conditions, namely: that the said companies shall commence the work on said road or roads within six months from the approval of this act by the President, and shall complete the road from Sacramento City to Benicia or Vallejo within three years thereafter, and the road from Marysville to Benicia or Vallejo on or before the 4th day of July, 1871; and the grant herein is upon the further condition that if any of said roads is not completed within the time specified in this act the remaining lands shall revert to the United States.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That in case either of said companies shall elect and file such election with the Secretary of the State of California within six months from the passage of this act, to the effect that said company will only connect, by railroad, the said city of Benicia or Vallejo with the main road at a distance not exceeding twelve miles from the point to be so connected, and abandon the construction of the balance of the aforesaid road, then and in that event the company so electing shall be entitled to the benefit of one quarter of the grant hereby made, provided said connection is completed in the same manner as herein specified for the main road on or before the main road shall be completed from Sacramento City to a point at or near Benicia or Vallejo, and in case the said election shall not be filed as herein required, and the said connection shall not be completed as in this section provided, the whole of the hereby granted lands shall be held by said State for the benefit and use of the company complying with the terms of this act.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the lands hereby granted to said State mentioned as aforesaid shall be conveyed and transferred to said company as the Legislature of said State may provide for the purposes aforesaid.

Mr. STEWART. This bill in its present shape is a very slight aid to a very important railroad, running from Sacramento to the bay of San Francisco, at Vallejo, and also to Marysville. It grants no money and only twenty-nine thousand acres of land according to an exact report which I have from the Commissioner of the General Land Office. Most of the land on the route is either swamp or overflowed land belonging to the State, or private land held under grants from the Mexican Government, or absorbed by the grant to the Pacific railroad which goes by way of Stockton. The result is that the road provided for by this bill gets a very small portion of the land, only twenty-nine thousand acres for the whole length of the route. There would be several million acres for so long a route if we had the land to grant.

The bill further provides that none of these lands shall be conveyed until the road is entirely completed. It amounts to little more than a congressional recognition. The land is worth but a few thousand dollars. The bill also gives the right of way where the road goes over the public lands. The grant is to the State of California for the use of that railroad company which shall construct the road. It will be perceived by the bill that there are two companies organized. They have made an agreement between themselves which is substantially embodied in the bill, and the company first constructing the road is to have the benefit of the grant. It is perfectly satisfactory to all the parties. It is a bill that is entirely inside of safe precedents. Nobody is likely to ask for another such bill because it makes a very lean grant.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This bill has only been reported for a day or two. It was reported from a committee of which I am a member, and with the understanding, as I understood, that it should lie long enough to let us have an opportunity of examining the printed substitute, as it is very long. I have not had that opportunity; but on running it over when it was not in print, it occurred to me that there were one or two amendments that ought to be made; and with a view to enable me to examine it, I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. CONNESS. I have no objection to that if the Senator desires to examine it.

The motion was agreed to.

MARY J. DIXON.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, the bill (S. No. 508) for the relief of Mrs. Mary J. Dixon, of Alexandria, in the State of Virginia, widow of the late Turner Dixon, deceased, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Mrs. Mary J. Dixon, of the city of Alexandria, and State of Virginia, widow of the late Turner Dixon, deceased, so much of the moneys received by the United States at the sale of a house and lot, situated in Alexandria, as his property by the direct tax commissioners for non-payment of the direct tax assessed on the premises, as the Secretary shall find to be in excess of the tax and the costs and expenses of the sale of the property.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. I call for the reading of the report in that case.

The Secretary read the following report, made by Mr. WILLIAMS on the 14th instant.

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. M. J. Dixon, respectfully report: That on the 5th of May, 1861, she, in company with her husband, left her residence at Alexandria, Virginia, to visit a brother-in-law in Fauquier county, Virginia.

That Mr. Dixon was afflicted with a chronic disease, and was accustomed at that season of the year, for the benefit of his health, to make a similar visit.

That after leaving as aforesaid the war broke out, and they were unable to get through the military lines so as to return, as they intended when they left.

That when the flag-of-truce system was established Mr. Dixon was too ill to return, and that he died on the 27th of July, A. D. 1864, at Charlottesville, Virginia, leaving no children, and bequeathing all his property to petitioner.

During the aforesaid absence of Mr. Dixon his house in Alexandria, worth $5,000, was sold by the United States for direct taxes. The amount of the tax, including expenses, was $19 24, and the house was sold for $2,575. The amount of the tax after it was levied was tendered to the commissioner by the agent of Mr. Dixon; but the commissioner refused to receive it on the ground that the law required the payment of the tax to be made by the owner in person.

Mrs. Dixon did not hear of the existence of the tax law or the assessment of the tax until about the time of her husband's death. Immediately after his decease Mrs. Dixon became sick, and was confined to her bed for a long time with a serious illness, brought on by her exertions and anxiety about her husband. On the 17th of January, 1865, and while petitioner was in feeble health, she started from Charlottesville for her home in Alexandria. She was detained on the road by inclement weather, broken bridges, and illness, and after the most strenuous exertions and dangerous exposure she reached Alexandria on the 17th of February, 1865, just ten days after the time allowed by law for the redemption of her property had expired.

Petitioner prays that under these circumstances, after deducting the said $19 24 from the amount for which the property sold, the balance may be refunded to her, and shows that by the loss of said property she would be left in destitute circumstances. Your committee are of the opinion that the absence of Mrs. Dixon from her home at the time of the rebellion broke out and afterward is not chargeable to any feeling of disloyalty, and that she ought to have the relief for which she prays upon the ground that she started from Charlottesville in ample time to redeem her property from the tax sale, and would have so redeemed it if she had not been detained on the road by unforeseen and unavoidable accidents.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have some recollection of that case. I think the papers were once before the Judiciary Committee. I did not hear all of the report; but according to my recollection of it, if we pass this bill it will be establishing a dangerous precedent. Is every party who has lost his title to land under the law to be permitted to come in after the time has expired and redeem it; or does this bill simply provide for paying money out of the Treasury which has been received? I will inquire of the Senator who reported it, whether the design of the bill is to revert the title in the party, or to refund the money?

Mr. WILLIAMS. This bill proposes simply to refund the money in excess of the amount of tax, costs, and expenses of sale. There is an arrangement between the man who purchased the property and Mrs. Dixon in consideration of her circumstances and misfortunes to allow her to redeem it in case she can obtain these funds from the United States, which I think she is entitled to. I will say before I sit down that I think this is not the case that was before the Judiciary Committee. I know that there have been two or three similar cases before different committees. One I know was before the Judiciary Committee; one was referred to the Finance Committee; but I believe they have now all been referred to the Committee on Claims.

I do not regard this case as a dangerous precedent for this reason, and the relief is put expressly upon this ground: that Mrs. Dixon started from Charlottesville with an intention to redeem her property in ample time to arrive there for that purpose, but the roads were almost impassable, the bridges broken down, and she was taken ill upon the road, and so was unavoidably detained, and did not reach Alexandria until ten days after the time when the two years allowed by law for redemption had expired. This relief is put upon the ground, which is frequently recognized in the court of equity, that she did all she could to redeem her property, but was prevented by unavoidable accident from doing so. The bill simply provides that, after deducting the amount of the direct tax, the amount of the costs, and the expenses of the sale, the Secretary of the Treasury shall refund back to her the amount of money actually received into the Treasury from the sale. The property sold was worth $5,000. It sold for a little over two thousand dollars. It sold at a great sacrifice. Mrs. Dixon is a widow lady. Her loyalty is put entirely beyond question by the evidence in the case; and she is left by the death of her husband and by the loss of this property in destitute circumstances.

It was the opinion of the committee that these facts relative to her attempted return for the purpose of redeeming her property made this an exceptional case, and that it would not be a precedent that would authorize any interference by Congress in other cases where property had been sold.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator allow me to inquire whether the husband was living when this property was sold, and whether he was not a disloyal man?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not advised as to the particular views or opinions of the husband; there is no evidence on that subject. I think in May, 1861, or early in the year 1861, this man, who was an invalid, who had a chronic disease, visited another part of Virginia for the purpose of improving his health. He had been accustomed to make that trip during the summer months. He fell sick, and was sick a long time, and died, and there was no opportunity for him to attend to the matter, because he was not only too sick to attend to it, but there was no communication between the place where he was living and the city of Alexandria. They left an agent in Alexandria to look after the property, and he proposed to pay the tax after it was levied, but the commissioner would not receive it. The evidence shows that they left their household goods and effects there with an evident intention to return to Alexandria as soon as possible, but they were prevented by the breaking out of the war, by the sickness and death of the husband, and by the illness and misfortunes that attended the petitioner. I will say that the committee did not take into consideration the merits or demerits of the husband, for he died two or three years ago; but they were very unwilling to grant any relief of this kind until the loyalty of the petitioner was established beyond all question; and I think there is no doubt on that subject. I not only learn that from the evidence in the case, but I learn it from parties outside of the case.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It seems that the loyalty of the husband has not been inquired into. If this is the case that was once before the Judiciary Committee my recollection of it is not now sufficiently distinct to enable me to state the facts in regard to it; but it seems to me it might be a very important inquiry to ascertain whether the husband was disloyal or not. If he was a disloyal man, aiding the rebellion when this property was sold, it might be very questionable whether the proof that his wife was loyal would justify her coming in at a subsequent period and redeeming the land from sale.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I can say in answer to that that the husband gave the rebellion no aid and comfort, because he was a helpless invalid and unable to take care of himself, and his wife accompanied him for the very purpose of taking care of him. He had a chronic disease which was very debilitating, and he died from the effects of that disease. What his particular views or sympathies were as to the rebellion is not known to the committee; no inquiry was made upon that subject; but the evidence is perfectly conclusive that he gave no aid to the rebellion because he was not able to take care of himself.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think this case ought to be a suggestion to the Committee on Finance to make some general regulation on this subject. Where a man's property is sold for taxes not paid, and a large amount of property is sold and there is a great excess, that does not belong to the Government. That excess, without any legislation on the subject, ought to be paid to the owner. A man's property is sold simply to make the taxes. That is the principle of all the State legislation that I am acquainted with, and it ought to be a general regulation. If a person's property is sold for taxes, and there is an excess, that excess should be paid to the owner.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It was on the principle stated by the Senator who has just addressed us that the committee were very much influenced. The whole tax is paid, and this bill only remits to a helpless widow woman, whose loyalty was established, and who made every exertion to reach Alexandria in time to redeem her property, the amount in excess of the tax and costs of sale; and it was looked upon by the committee as a harsh case for the Government to hold that excess in their hands.

Mr. HOWE. The committee did not consider the question suggested by the Senator from Indiana at all, and did not suppose that this was a case which would call for the application of any such rule if Congress should see fit to adopt such a one. The only thing the committee attempted to do by this report was, to relieve against the effects of a casualty, an accident beyond the control of the party seeking to reach her home in time to redeem her property under the law as it stood; but by a series of accidents, railway accidents and disease, she was prevented from getting there until ten days after the time expired. If she had been ten days earlier, as she would have been but for these casualties, she would have redeemed it under the law as it stands; and inasmuch as the only relief she asks for is the refunding of the excess now in the Treasury, and as the party holding the estate, taking cognizance of these accidents, is perfectly willing to relinquish the title by getting back the money that he paid, we all thought it was only an honest act for the Government to refund that amount.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. CATTELL. I ask leave to present the credentials of Hon. FREDERICK T. FRELINGHUYSEN, elected by the Legislature of New Jersey to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Hon. William Wright. The additional certificate required by the act of July 25, 1866, has been forwarded by the Governor of the State to the President of the Senate.

The credentials were read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that he has received a certificate from the Governor of the State of New Jersey certifying to the same fact, and this certificate, together with the credentials, will be placed on the files of the Senate.

The oaths prescribed by law were administered to Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, and he took his seat in the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 918) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PENSION AGENTS.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. No. 69) to provide for the payment of pensions, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SIDNEY PERHAM of Maine, Mr. JOHN F. BENJAMIN of Missouri, and Mr. NELSON TAYLOR of New York, managers at the same on its part.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the amendment of the House to the bill; and, on motion of Mr. LANE, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill of the Senate No. 69, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the bill (H. R. No. 718) to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes, which is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to the amendment of the committee, to insert in section eighteen, after line thirty, the following:

Books, maps, charts, and other printed matter specially imported in good faith for any public library or society incorporated or established for philosophical, literary, or religious purposes, or for the encouragement of the fine arts, or for the use of any college, academy, school, or seminary of learning in the United States.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, the man who opposes the passage of this bill must expect to be slandered. The "protectionists," as they choose to call themselves, have already opened the vials of their indignant wrath upon the heads of those whose opposition they anticipated. Threats of utter political extinction are hurled against every man who, in the exercise of an independent judgment, is not prepared to impose upon his constituents the burdens which the various manufacturing combinations demand. That portion of the public press sub-orned to their interest is rife with charges that "the capital is thronged with freetraders, and that British gold is operating to secure American legislation for British interests." Every man is condemned in advance who would inquire before he would vote.

We know what all this means, and so far as I have the ability, I am resolved that the people shall know what it means.

It means that two or three large manufacturing interests in the country, not satisfied with the enormous profits they have realized during the last six years, are determined at whatever hazard to put more money in their pockets; and to this end they have persuaded some and coerced other manufacturing interests to unite with them in a great combination demand for what they call protection to American labor, but what some others call robbery of the American laborer and agriculturist. It seems that the men specially interested in the passage of this bill are bent upon taking the legislation of the country into their own hands; that they are unwilling that there should be impartial, free inquiry into the subject; that conscious of the interested motives from which their own action spring they cannot conceive it possible that those who disagree with them can be inspired by any other than selfish considerations; that having bought and paid for the support of a portion of the public press they cannot imagine that there is any longer such a being in existence as an independent, manly, honest editor of a newspaper.

Mr. President, this mad dog cry of "free trade and British gold" passes by me like the idle wind. The men who utter it follow their vocation and earn their bread by it. I would not disturb them.

Nor am I alarmed at the scheme now being carried into execution of sending free of charge to every prominent man in Iowa and elsewhere in the Northwest a weekly copy of a New York journal of what is called the "protectionist" school for the double purpose of building up a sentiment there in favor of high duties and of politically destroying such members of Congress as may not vote in favor of them. The men who pay for the papers can well afford the expenditure; and the results that will flow from this bill, which I doubt not is fated to pass, will be a sufficient refutation of all the arguments they contain.

I have known nothing so alarming in the whole history of legislation in this country as the methods that have been adopted to secure the passage of this bill. The people have not asked for it; they, so far as we know, are satisfied with the present tariff laws. The members of this Congress were not elected upon any issue of this kind. This enactment is solely demanded by the manufacturers of iron and a few wool agriculturists and speculators who call themselves the wool-growers of the country. They have organized associations, contributed large sums of money to mold public sentiment through the press, and have formed combinations with other interests to control the legislation of the country. The result of their labors is before us, and we are to determine whether we will permit these clubs and associations of interested parties to govern us in our action as the clubs and associations of revolutionary France governed the constituent assembly of that country.

It is the fashion to denounce every man who does not favor a prohibitory tariff as a free trader. The charge is made that free-trade agents are at work to influence Congress, and that our tables are encumbered with free-trade documents. Who has seen these free-trade agents? I have yet to see the first man who was in favor of free trade, nor have I seen any man who was opposed to a revenue tariff which should incidentally protect such branches of American industry as needed the fostering aid of the Government. It is on questions of detail that we differ. We disagree as to how much money shall be taken from the pocket of Peter to support and enrich his brother Paul.

We are told that for some centuries England maintained a protective system almost amounting to prohibition, and grew rich and powerful under it; and that example is presented to us as worthy of imitation, as though the world had made no progress in arts and sciences, in productive resources and machinery, no advance in the science of political economy and the application of its principles to practical life. God forbid that we should go back to the early days of the British Empire, or even to her more modern days, for laws or policies upon which to model our own systems, national, social, or economic. Besides, it is undoubtedly the fact that the prosperity, the wealth, and the renown of England are due in a far greater degree to her commerce than to her manufactures. It is commerce that is the great civilizer and elevator. It is commerce that has poured the wealth of the world into the lap of England. Yet the tendency of this measure will be to utterly destroy the commerce of this nation, already almost swept from the ocean by hostile legislation.

And now what is the measure before us? It purports to be a bill "to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes." If this bill when passed into a law would indeed "provide increased revenue from imports" no man could support it more cheerfully than I would. That is precisely what my constituents desire, and which they believe the interests of the country demand. They would be glad to see that kind of legislation adopted which would secure such an "increased revenue from imports" as would be sufficient to pay the annual governmental expenses and the interest on the public debt without resort to internal taxes. True relief is only to be found in the abolition of the manufacturers' tax. But the friends of this bill do not support it upon any such theory as that. They do not pretend that it will "provide increased revenue from imports." If they thought it would, they would utterly and forever repudiate it. It is for precisely the reverse reason assumed in the title of the bill; it is because it will not "provide increased revenue from imports;" it is because they believe that under its provisions foreign products, coming in competition with American products, will be so excluded from our ports that no duty at all can be collected on them that they require its passage. The title is a misnomer. Before it passes from our hands let it be amended so as to read: "An act to prevent the collection of duties from imports and defray the expenses of Government by direct taxation."

This bill is said to contain a provision for the benefit of the wool-growers of the western States, and on that account my aid is invoked to secure its passage. No one could be more gratified to be able to render to that class of our people any legislative assistance in my power than I would be, provided I could do so without detriment to the common interests of the whole country, and not otherwise. Let us examine this subject of wool as exhibited in this bill.

The existing tariff fixes a duty of three cents per pound specific on wools costing twelve cents per pound or less, and six cents per pound on wools costing more than twelve cents and less than twenty-four cents. The bill before us declares—

That merino, mestiza, mets, or metis wools, or other wools of merino blood, immediate or remote; Down clothing wools, and wools of like character, with any of the preceding, including such as have been heretofore usually imported into the United States from Buenos Ayres, New Zealand, Australia, Cape of Good Hope, Russia, Great Britain, Canada, and elsewhere, and also including all wools not heretofore described, and upon Leicester, Cotswold, Lincolnshire, Down combing wools, Canada long wools, or other like combing wools, of English blood, and usually known by the term merino used; and also all hair of the alpaca, goat, and other like animals, the value whereof, at the last port or place whence exported to the United States, excluding charges in such port, shall be thirty-two cents or less per pound, the duty shall be ten cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, ten per cent, ad valorem; upon wools of the same class, unwashed, the value whereof at the last port or place whence exported to the United States, excluding charges in such port, shall exceed thirty-two cents per pound, the duty shall be twelve cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, ten per cent. ad valorem.

This is the demand of the Wool-Growers' Association.

Now, let it be borne in mind, that coupled with this demand and dependent upon it is the demand of the Wool-Manufacturers' Association, another society in full sympathy and accord with the Wool-Growers' Association, and cooperating with them to secure the adoption of this bill. They demand that for every cent of duty imposed on wool there shall be four cents per pound imposed on imported woolsens, and then thirty-five per cent. ad valorem added to that to cover the cost of chemicals, dye-stuffs, transportation, &c. Mr. Wells, the special commissioner of the revenue, in his very able report to the Secretary of the Treasury, seems to think that this is in some measure a reasonable demand, for he says:

"It must be evident, now, that to the extent to which the cost of wool is increased to the American manufacturer through the increased duties on his raw materials, it will be necessary to impose an equivalent increase of duties on the importation of foreign woolsens, otherwise the increased price of wool, growing out of the duty, would act as a bounty in favor of the foreign manufacturer, and prove speedily disastrous both to the American wool-grower and to the American woolen manufacturer."

To balance the duties proposed upon wool, the executive committee of the woolen manufacturers claim, and endeavor to prove it to be essential to the preservation of their industry, that for every cent of duty imposed on wool, four cents per pound must be charged on all woolsens imported. It is also clear that if the price is to be enhanced to the extent of the duty the advance must be estimated alike on goods made of domestic as well as of foreign wool. Consequently, for every cent of duty imposed on wool, the American consumer will be taxed four cents per pound on his manufactured woolsens; which tax on the present annual consumption of the country, namely, one hundred and fifty million pounds, would amount to the sum of $6,000,000 for each cent of duty imposed on wool.

Assuming the existing rate of duty upon unwashed wool at six cents per pound, the present annual tax for the protection of this interest is, therefore, ($6,000,000 × 6 cents) = $36,000,000; but at the proposed rate, assuming eleven and a half cents as the minimum, this tax will be further increased: ($6,500,000 × 5½) = $35,750,000; or, in other words, the proposed tariff on wool and woolsens will tax the community (if it should have the effect sought by those who propose it) to the extent of $71,250,000 per annum for the protection of an interest, the whole annual value of whose product as we have already shown, cannot be considered in excess of $36,000,000 gold valuation. Can any such amount of taxation on an absolute necessity of life in this country be justified under the plea of protection to American industry, and that industry one which cannot claim high protection on the plea that it is not yet well established?

"Nothing less," say the committee of the wool manufacturers in their report, "than a specific duty of fifty-three cents per pound on their manufactures will be sufficient to place the manufacturer in the same position as if he had his raw material free of duty," a position which he must demand as an imperative necessity for the preservation of his industry, and added to this specific duty there is in the bill an ad valorem duty of thirty-five per cent."

Now, it must occur to the most casual observer that with this relative increase in the duty on woolen fabrics the manufacturer can import wool to compete with domestic wool to precisely the same advantage that he can under the present tariff. Yea, with greater profit, for the proposed duty on the manufactured goods is relatively greater than on the raw material.

What, then, will be the effect of this measure? Granted, for the argument, that it will immediately increase the price of both domestic and foreign wools to the temporary advantage off the home producer. But at whose cost will this increase be made? Of course every man knows that the profits of both the wool-grower and wool-manufacturer must be derived from the consumer. Let me illustrate how this is: The average weight of the ordinary clothing of the male population in the United States is made from cloth the average weight of ten to eleven ounces per yard of three fourths of a yard in width. If the average quantity for each person for a full suit be for a coat four yards, for a waistcoat three fourths of a yard, for trousers two and one fourth yards, for an overcoat four yards, making for the suit eleven yards; which would cost in England seventy cents per yard, or $7.70 in gold. To this under this bill must be added $5.83 duty in gold, to which should be added the premium on gold, for it operates as a duty on the import, at thirty-five cents, amounting to $2.05, making a total of $7.90 duty, or twenty cents more than the material cost in England of which the suit was made. This is an example of the protection which the combination of wool-growers and wool-manufacturers demand that the common people of this country shall afford them. And this is a fair illustration of the increase of prices given by this bill over all imported clothing and woolsens.

But is it true that this increase of duty will permanently increase the price of wool? I had supposed it to be "an axiom in political economy that no amount of duty on any foreign product can permanently enhance, above the cost of production, the price of the domestic product so long as it could be produced to an unlimited extent." Does any one imagine that the increased price will not stimulate the production of wool in Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, and especially in New Mexico and Texas, where it can be produced as cheaply as on the Pampas of South America? I venture the prediction that the effect of this law would ultimately be, were it continued on the statute-book which I do not predict, to entirely destroy the wool-growing business east of the Mississippi river, in all of these States where wool-growing is conducted upon lands costing thirty dollars per acre and upward. Iowa, so far as I have heard, with her two million sheep demands no protection. That demand comes from the wool-growers of Ohio and the States east of them. I do not understand that we do not receive to-day a fair price for our wool as compared with the prices of other agricultural products. With the present price of sheep and labor we can as well afford to produce wool as we can corn, beef, and pork. During the war the producers received from sixty cents to one dollar a pound for wool. I agree fully with the commissioner when he says that—

"The low prices of wool at the present time are no legitimate arguments in respect to this question, inasmuch as they are abnormal in their character, and are due mainly to a general depression of business, consequent upon an anticipated reduction of prices, and to an over-importation of foreign wools in the spring and summer of 1866, stimulated by the prospect of an advance in the tariff."

And I further agree with him in his opinion that—

"The trouble under which the wool-grower at present labors is one and the same affecting every other branch of industry in the country, namely: a most extraordinary advance in the cost of all the elements entering into production. To remedy this state of things the wool-grower now proposes to make the cost of production still higher; for it cannot be supposed that he alone, of all the producers of the country, is to be allowed to advance the price of his products without submitting to an equivalent advance in the price of all others."

I wish it to be understood that I want to protect the wool-growers. I want to protect them against an enormous advance upon the necessities of life; against an increase of twenty-five or thirty per cent. in the cost of all of their agricultural implements; against an increase in the clothing they wear, the food they eat, the books they read. I would not advise or stimulate if I could the people of my State, under the stimulus of a high duty, to rush into attempts to produce wool on a large scale, which cannot be of advantage to the State, and must in the end be disastrous to them. From the time of the Shepherd Kings down to the present moment, no nation, people, or community that devoted their energies principally to the husbandry of flocks ever became rich or powerful. Providence has created certain regions on this continent, one would almost think, with a special reference to this kind of husbandry, and planted there both the shepherds and the sheep. When the Pacific railroad shall be pushed a little further to the Southwest, the wool of Santa Fé will drive many large wool-growers in this country from this avocation.

I admit that the agriculturist who diversifies his labor and his productions, the farmer with his fifteen horses, his forty cattle, his fifty swine, and one hundred head of sheep is a benefactor, and should be encouraged. Let us see how this bill encourages him. His one hundred head of sheep will furnish him two hundred and fifty pounds of wool, which will be increased in value by the passage of this bill, if it does what its most ardent friends claim for it, fifteen cents a pound or $42.50 on his clip. But in order to secure this, he must consent to be taxed six cents a bushel on the salt that he feeds to his sheep and with which he cures his meat and seasons his food; he must agree to an additional tax upon the plows, harrows, shovels, hoes, reapers, with which he cultivates his crops, and the engine that drags his products to market, upon his clothing, the household utensils used in preparing his food, and the table cutlery with which he eats it. I would be pleased to know where the net profit on the one hundred head of sheep would be found in this transaction; and if that would be small, where would the equally deserving farmer who was not the owner of sheep find a compensation for the additional taxation put upon him by this bill. And let it be remembered that those who raise wool are only as one in a thousand by the side of those who consume it. But the truth is, this bill will not cause any permanent and reliable advance in the price of wool. There may be a sort of spasmodic rise brought about for the benefit of the speculators holding large quantities of it, but it cannot last. This bill will only benefit the manufacturer by placing the consumer completely in his power. Never was the innocent sheep more completely shorn than the wool-growers have been in the nice little combination they entered into with the manufacturers to increase the price of wearing apparel and blankets on the consumer.

Why, I ask, is so high a duty placed upon the wool of Cotswold, Leicestershire, and other long-wooled sheep which are not produced in this country to any appreciable extent? I believe we have at this time a capital amounting to between five and eight million dollars invested in the worsted business. This wool is used solely for that purpose. The effect of this bill will be to root up and destroy that entire worsted business to the advantage of nobody in this country so far as I can learn; but to the great detriment of everybody who uses worsted fabrics by greatly increasing the price of them.

But the iron makers insist that they are in distress and must be relieved. It was for their benefit in the first instance that this bill was proposed. I do not profess to be as well informed upon the subject of iron manufacture as some others, or perhaps as I ought to be, but so far as my observation and inquiries have extended I am convinced that every iron establishment in the country, properly located and economically conducted, is yielding reasonable profits to its owners, and some of them yield enormous profits. By "reasonable profits" I mean what is considered by men engaged in other legitimate business to be fair returns for their capital invested.

The present duties on the leading descriptions of iron are:

	Per cent.
Iron, pig	52
Iron, bar, (common,) equivalent to	68
Iron, small, round and square, equivalent to	77
Iron, hoop, equivalent to	73
Iron, band, equivalent to	64
Iron, refined, equivalent to	58 to 86
Iron, best Yorkshire, equivalent to	36 to 40
Iron, best English boiler plates, equivalent to	33
Iron, sheet, Nos. 11 to 20 wire gauge, equivalent to	55
Steel, extra cast, equivalent to	41
Steel, blister, equivalent to	33 to 44
Steel, third quality spring, equivalent to	69
Steel tires for locomotives, equivalent to	45

To these rates freight, insurance, commissions, &c., must be added, thus to some extent increasing the duties above the rates here given.

The average varieties of iron used by blacksmiths, machinists, and ship-builders, now protected to the extent of fifty-five per cent., is advanced by this bill fifteen per cent. Nail plate, hoop-iron, and small bar-iron now protected by sixty per cent. duty is directly advanced by the bill from fifteen to seventy-five per cent., and some of it over one hundred per cent. But the iron manufacturers are not satisfied with the monstrous duties apparent upon the face of the bill. By adroitly changing the classification of iron it will be observed that several descriptions have been carried from lower to higher classes, thus making an additional increase on plate-iron of two leading sizes of one fourth of a cent per pound, and on round and square iron of some sizes, namely, No. 9, wire gauge to less than five sixteenths of an inch an increase of three fourths of a cent per pound. This is not apparent on the face of the bill to a casual observer who does not compare the present tariff with the proposed one.

In order that the Senate may have a complete understanding what the duties proposed upon the various descriptions of iron will amount to, I lay before it a table that has been prepared with a great deal of care and for the accuracy of which I think I can safely vouch.

Table comparing the cost per ton, on board, at the port of shipment, including sixty cents per ton shipping charges, of iron imported into the United States, with the duties proposed to be charged on the same in the bill reported by the Senate Committee on Finance, January 11, 1867—reduced to United States gold.

The rates of duty average somewhat over one hundred per cent. on the cost on board. Of the twenty-eight specifications of duties, about thirteen are under and fifteen are over cost.

Is it possible that we are prepared to place such a tax as this upon iron which is the raw material for all our industries, and which it has been the policy of all civilized nations to afford to their people cheap? Can I justify myself to my constituents for voting to double the cost of iron by pleading that in their behalf we secured the blessed boon of compelling them to pay double for all the clothing they wear? Of the proposed duties on sheet-iron it is unnecessary to speak. Upon some descriptions they are confessedly prohibitory.

The steel manufacturers laid upon our desks yesterday a statement of their demands. They tell us that in 1859, under an ad valorem duty of twelve per cent., the manufacture of steel became an assured success; that the duty fixed by the act of 1861 was agreed on between the importers and manufacturers, and was well adapted to the then existing state of the manufacture in this country; and they now demand an increase of from forty-six to sixty-seven per cent. on the existing tariff. On this point

I submit to the Senate a table carefully prepared showing facts important to be known:

DESCRIPTION OF STEEL.	Cost per invoice per pound.	Duty before the war per pound.	Present duty per pound and 10 per cent. ad valorem on 31 cent. rate.	Proposed duty per pound and 10 per cent. ad valorem on 5 cent. rate.	Advance on present duty per pound.	Increase of duty by per pound by Senate bill over duty per pound existing before war. Table of costs based on the above, with actual duties before the war, present duties, and proposed duties, and advance on present duties per pound.

a single fabric the cost of which will not be augmented by this increased duty? The railroad iron-makers, content with the existing duty of fourteen dollars, insist that if the duty be raised on ordinary bar iron they must have an increased duty on their production to meet the increased cost of blooms and the increased wages of puddlers and other skilled laborers.

The manufacturers of every variety of hardware and cutlery asked with great justice that we should give to them an increased protection, because of the anticipated increase in the value of what is to them the raw material, iron and steel. There is not a single industry that does not demand and need greater protection, because of the increase you will give to these articles. The manufacturers of machinery require, they tell us, that the duty on machinery shall be raised from thirty-five per cent. to sixty-five per cent. ad valorem, at least a rate corresponding with no other articles in the present bill except upon silks and other articles of luxury, saving and excepting always iron and steel. They insist that a machine for spinning cotton yarn costing in gold $10,000 shall have added to it a duty of $6,500, and all other machinery employed in the manufacture of cotton, wool, &c., must be enhanced in a corresponding degree. Mills therefore already built will become monopolies.

Do the advocates of this measure insist that this is the way to build up manufactures and make cheap goods? Is this the way to spread prosperity through the land and make glad the hearts of the poor? Is there any one so blind as not to see that the effect of the bill will be to increase the colossal fortunes of iron and steel masters and of the owners of woolen and cotton mills at the expense of the consumers of their products? Is this the way to pay the interest on the public debt? Will an increase of the price of every necessary of life and of every consumable fabric enable the people to more easily pay their internal taxes or make them any more willing to do it? These are questions that it would do well for us to ponder. Yet we are expected to vote for all this, because we are permitted to have an increased duty on wool.

We were reminded the other day that the farmers' interests were to be specially protected under this bill, and so it contains a provision by which the duty on salt, an absolute necessity of life, is increased one hundred and sixty per cent. above its cost. We in the West produce beef and pork which are packed and sent to foreign countries, where they come in competition with beef and pork packed elsewhere, with salt that pays no tribute at all, free salt. Yet the farmers' interests are protected!

Mr. President, another effect of this bill will be to completely destroy the commerce of this country. I hold that no nation can be great and powerful and occupy a prominent and respectable position in the family of nations without commerce. When I said this to one of the gentlemen outside of the Senate who were advocating the passage of this bill he denied my proposition, and referred me to Austria as a great nation without commerce—priest-ridden, bankrupt, despotic, disintegrating Austria—as an example to the country!

Sir, you have already by your hostile legislation nearly destroyed your commerce. You have destroyed your business with Mexico and with Central America; your carrying trade is now to a great extent done in foreign bottoms. I am told by those upon whom I rely that where ten years ago there were ten vessels of this country in the South American ports there is not one now. This change has not been wrought by the Alabamas and Floridas, but by us. You have a little commerce with Calcutta and the East Indies; but before this bill passes, if I am not mistaken as to where the strength of the body lies on these questions, you will so amend it as to destroy that commerce also. This bill will effectually destroy your trade with the countries of northern Europe.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Let me ask the Senator

Upon Bessemer steel rails is fixed a duty of forty-five dollars per ton, doubtless intended to be, as it certainly will be, entirely prohibitory, all for the benefit of the rich monopolists who are the assignees of the patented process by which it is manufactured.

Now, what is to be the effect of this great increase in the price of iron and steel? Need any one be told that iron and steel are the bases of all production, and that the enhancement of their value will increase the cost of every variety of manufacture? Can any one name to point me to a country that is not prosperous in its manufacturing which has a commerce. Where is the country divested of manufacture that has a commerce?

Mr. GRIMES. I do not know that it is necessary for me to answer interrogations of the gentleman. He is specially interested in the subject of manufactures. I am not interested either in manufactures or commerce. I speak from the knowledge of historic facts I have gathered in the course of my life. If I am in error I can be corrected.

Mr. President, I have no desire to weary the Senate by criticisms of other crudities, partialities, I may say enormities, contained in the bill. I leave to others who may follow me the discussion of other branches of this subject.

Why should we make haste to pass this measure? We were told yesterday by the Senator from Ohio that it was only necessary because of the high price of labor. Does he expect that this bill, when enacted into a law, will reduce the value of skilled labor, or that it will have a tendency in that direction? On the contrary, will it not have the effect to increase the value of that description of labor, and shall we not have the same manufacturing interests, with the same argument in their mouths, clamoring at our doors at the next session for increased duties on those provided in this bill?

He also told us that this tariff was not required by the iron masters to protect them against the pauper labor of Europe. This is undoubtedly so. The protection is required against the high prices of American labor, and nothing can show more thoroughly the absurdity of this measure. Why, we are told that the difference between the prices of labor in the iron works at Pittsburg and Johnstown in the same State of Pennsylvania, and within less than two hundred miles of each other, is sufficient to enable the Cambria works at Johnstown to divide a fair dividend on their capital, while in the Pittsburg works no profits are realized at all. In Pittsburg there are leagues and combinations and dissipation among the workmen, so that their labor is not as valuable as the same labor would be at other places, whereupon the employers post off to Washington to secure legislation, which in their judgment will protect them against high wages and unremunerative labor.

Our true policy is to wait. Let us make haste slowly. The financial and business affairs of this country will adjust themselves if we will only let them alone. Values of all kinds are falling, beginning with agricultural products, and will of their own momentum adjust themselves to the specie standard. Skilled labor will, like everything else, in a little while find its true reward. The true relief for the manufacturer and the people alike should be sought, and can only be found in a reduction of the internal taxes on manufactures. So much does the internal tax duplicate itself in the various forms in which it is imposed upon manufactures that a reduction of one cent from the internal tax would probably be of as much benefit to the manufacturer as the imposition of five per cent. duty under this bill.

But the passage of this bill will preclude us from making such a reduction of the tax, for its practical effect would be to increase the duty for the benefit of the manufacturer and throw so much greater burden upon the other sources of internal revenue. Surely we shall not be asked, after giving the manufacturers all they required under this bill, to the loss of the public revenue I am convinced of not less than fifty million dollars per annum, we shall not be asked to also reduce the tax on their manufactures and thus throw still greater burdens on the consumers.

Mr. President, were I an iron manufacturer I would protest against the passage of this bill. From the day of its enactment agitation for its repeal will begin. The greatest of all evils in business of every description are fluctuations and uncertainties. This measure will derange all the business of the country and afford relief to no considerable portion of the people. It cannot remain long on your statute-book. Its atrocious inequalities and partialities and one-sidedness will attract the attention and receive the condemnation of the people whenever they shall have an opportunity to pass upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Several SENATORS. What is it?

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to insert in the free list, after line thirty of section eighteen:

Books, maps, charts, and other printed matter specially imported in good faith for any public library or society incorporated or established for philosophical, literary, or religious purposes, or for the encouragement of the fine arts, or for the use of any college, academy, school, or seminary of learning in the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Having examined these questions more critically since yesterday's session, I am satisfied that the amendment which I proposed will effectuate all the useful purposes I designed for it by striking out all that it contains after the word "arts," and I believe that will be satisfactory to the Committee of Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont modifies his amendment by striking out all after the word "arts."

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to hear it read, then.

The Secretary read the words proposed to be inserted, as follows:

Books, maps, charts, and other printed matter specially imported in good faith for any public library or society, incorporated or established for philosophical, literary, or religious purposes, or for the encouragement of the fine arts.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I believe it is regarded as scarcely in good taste to oppose an amendment like this, because when a man speaks in the name of the colleges and the high schools of the country and the libraries of the country he is supposed to speak by such authority that no man should question what he says; but I must confess to a sympathy with the sentiments expressed yesterday evening by the distinguished Senator from Oregon, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

There is no use to pretend that this is an amendment in the interest of the common schools and the common people of the country. It is not of that character, and it cannot be. The common schools of the country are supplied with their literature from the productions of the American press, and I am very glad that it is so. I do not know of a single foreign book going into the schools of the State of Indiana, and I suppose it is so most generally over the country. But there are colleges, well endowed institutions, and there are high schools, and there are select libraries to which it will be an advantage to be allowed to bring from foreign countries without any duty rare and costly books and maps.

Now, when everybody is taxed to bear the burdens of the Government, when every interest in society has to help to bear these burdens, why is it that even the literary taste of the country shall not bear its part? The humble laborer has to pay something on the salt that goes into the food for his children; and yet we are asked to say that the rich and endowed institution, the places of resort of the learned and wealthy as a general thing, shall have a peculiar privilege and exemption from the burdens of Government.

A man would do better, I suppose, not to entertain these sentiments; it would perhaps be more popular to just say that what the Senator from Vermont proposes is not to be questioned. If the burdens of Government were not heavy I would not care anything about it; but everybody has to come up to the work now, no interest escapes, and the college that wishes to secure for its library the rare works of European minds and European presses had as well pay upon the importation as the man who is required to pay a duty upon the salt that seasons the food for his family. I do not believe in many exemptions. When taxes are to be gathered I believe in the doctrine that they shall apply to everybody and all alike. I think I appreciate the importance of seminaries of learning and of colleges as highly as any Senator; but I do not believe in exempting them from the burdens that all the people have to bear.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, by the existing law it seems to me the Senator from Indiana forgot public libraries and literary societies receive books, maps, and engravings free of duty. It is now proposed to change the existing law, so that public libraries shall no longer receive books, maps, charts, and engravings free of duty. Now, it is a little curious that this moment is seized for this important change, which I must call retrogressive in its character. It seems like going back to the dark ages. We made no such change during the war. We went through all its terrible trials and the consequent taxation without any such proposition. Now that peace has come, and when we are considering how to mitigate taxation, it is proposed to add this new tax.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator allow me to ask whether he regards this bill as a mitigation of the taxes upon goods brought from foreign countries?

Mr. SUMNER. I am not discussing the bill as a general measure.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I thought the Senator spoke of the present effort to mitigate taxation.

Mr. SUMNER. I believe I am not wrong when I say there is everywhere a disposition to reduce taxation, whether it may be on foreign or on domestic articles. It is the desire of the country and it is the irresistible tendency of things; and at this moment, when the country is filled with that desire, will they not be astonished if they find that instead of reducing a tax on knowledge you augment it?

I insist that in imposing this duty you not only change the existing law, but you depart from the standing policy of republican institutions. Everywhere we have education at the public expense. The first form of this is in the public school, which is open to all. But the public library is the complement or supplement of the public school. As well impose a tax on the public school as on the public library.

I doubt if the Senate is fully aware of the number of public libraries springing into existence. This is a characteristic of our times. Nor is it peculiar to our country. Down to a recent day public libraries were chiefly collegiate. In Europe they were collegiate or conventional. There were no libraries of the people. But such libraries are now appearing in England in France. Every considerable place or center has its library for the benefit of the neighborhood. But this movement, like every liberal tendency, is more marked in the United States. Here public libraries are coming into being without number. The public library of Boston and the Astor library of New York are magnificent examples, which smaller towns are imitating. In my own State there are public libraries; in Salem, Newburyport, New Bedford, Worcester, Springfield, indeed I might almost say in every town. But Massachusetts is not alone. Public libraries are springing up in all the northern States. They are now extending like a belt of light across the country. They are like a new zodiac, in which knowledge travels with the sun from east to west. Of course these are all for the public benefit. They are public schools, where every book is a schoolmaster. To tax such institutions now for the first time is a new form of that old enemy—a "tax on knowledge." Such is my sense of their supreme value that I should be disposed to offer them bounties rather than taxes.

In continuation of this same hospitality to knowledge I wish to go still further and relieve imported books of all taxes so far as may be not inconsistent with interests already embarked in the book business. For instance, let all books, maps, charts, and engravings printed before 1840 take their place on the free list. Publications before that time cannot come in competition with any interests here. The revenue which they afford will be unimportant. The tax you impose adds to the burdens of scholars and professional men who need them. And yet every one of these books, when once imported, is a positive advantage to the country, by which knowledge is extended and the public taste is improved. I do not wish to claim too much for these instructive strangers belonging to another generation. I think that I do not err if I ask for them a generous welcome. But above all do not tax them.

It is sometimes said that we tax food and clothes, therefore we must tax books. I regret that food or clothes are taxed; because the tax presses upon the poor. But this is no reason for any additional tax. Reduce all such taxes rather than add to them. But you will not fail to remember the essential difference between these taxes. In New England education from the beginning was at the public expense, and this has been for some time substantially the policy of the whole country, except so far as it was darkened by slavery. Therefore I insist that because we tax food and clothes for the body this is no reason why we should tax food and clothes for the mind. The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 22, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Dixon, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Foster, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill, Patterson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, and Wilson—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Cattell, Conness, Doolittle, Grimes, Hendricks, Howard, Kirkwood, Lane, Norton, Ramsey, and Williams—13.

ABSENT—Messrs. Chandler, Cowan, Cragin, Creswell, Davis, Guthrie, Henderson, Howe, McDougall, Nesmith, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, and Yates—17.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to say in behalf of my colleague, [Mr. HENDERSON,] who is absent from the Senate to-day, that he is detained at his room by sickness.

Mr. SUMNER. I now offer an amendment which is naturally associated with the one on which the Senate has acted, to put maps, charts, and engravings executed prior to 1840 on the free list by inserting on page 102, between lines ninety-seven and ninety-eight of section eighteen, these words:

Maps, charts, and engravings executed prior to 1840.

I have no desire to say anything about this matter in addition to what I have already said. It seems to me a very plain case. There can be no competition with anything here at home; and I would give entire hospitality to every such product from abroad.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In regard to the amendment that has just been adopted, it was substantially, although not quite so extensive, what the existing law was, and as modified I have no particular objection to it. With regard to this motion of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts to place any of these matters upon the free list, I think the Senate had better not go any further in that direction. If the Senate will refer to the section which covers books, maps, charts, and engravings they will see that we have made a distinction which, after a great deal of deliberation, we thought would be a just and proper one, and afford all the protection that ought to be afforded and at the same time be sufficiently liberal toward these matters coming in.

We must raise revenue upon something. Maps, charts, and engravings are made in our own country. I do not know what particular advantage there would be, though I suppose there would be some, in picking up collections of charts prior to 1840. The Senate will observe that we put a duty of only fifteen per cent. on everything of that description executed prior to 1840. It is a very low rate of duty. I think they should pay some duty and the bill has been predicated upon that idea.

This is in the interest of knowledge, which my friend from Massachusetts and my friend from Vermont have so much at heart; and which I have somewhat at heart myself, although I do not feel perhaps so delicate a sensibility upon that subject as they do, for the reason that I do not know so much about books and never expect to; and yet so far as the exemption has gone with reference to public libraries I voted for it. I think we should raise a revenue from this source and we fix a small amount of duty on articles of this kind executed prior to 1840, gradually increasing as we come to those which are most apt to be published at the present day for the purpose of affecting the publication of books in our own country. I do not feel disposed to discuss the question at any length; I simply state my objection. I hope the Senate will adhere to the report of the committee on this subject.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not wish to protract the discussion. I will be very brief. I have already said that in putting these on the free list you do not so far as I understand interfere with any existing interest of our country. Then again, the revenue that will be derived from these items would be very small, and such as it is it would be paid by persons who are bringing into the country something that we ought to thank them for introducing. When they are doing that I do not think it advisable for us to tax them. I would encourage them to bring into the country every map, chart, and engraving executed before 1840 because it will be for the public advantage; it will be valuable in every collection of books in every private library; it will be consulted by students, by scholars, and, as I said a moment ago, it will help to elevate the public taste.

Now, it so happens that these very articles become of additional value often from their very antiquity. The Senator says the duty is small; it is only fifteen per cent.; but suppose for instance an engraving or map, which from its rarity is worth fifty dollars—

Mr. FESSENDEN. Allow me. We act on a principle directly opposite to that with regard to works of art. Take for instance a painting by a master; it is valuable in proportion to its antiquity, to its age, sometimes. We impose there an additional duty according to the increased value of the work. We impose a duty of thirty dollars on every painting to keep out cheap paintings; and after that there is an increase of ten per cent., I think—I speak from recollection—upon the value as the value increases. That is on an exactly opposite principle to that now contended for; and if you are to carry this out you may just as well go back to valuable paintings and say "the more valuable the better; they should come in free." The object is in this particular revenue; and revenue should be paid when these things are imported by those who are able to import them and able to pay revenue. If they are imported for the use of libraries and societies of the kind named in the amendment of the Senator from Vermont they are covered by that amendment which has been adopted. But if people of wealth choose to import old and valuable books, engravings, &c., it is proper that they should pay a revenue duty; we do not impose a large one.

Mr. SUMNER. It is not a large duty, the Senator says. The duty on these valuable pictures he puts at ten per cent., but the duty on maps and engravings he puts at fifteen per cent.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is a specific duty in the first place of thirty dollars on every painting.

Mr. SUMNER. But take one—a valuable painting; the specific duty of thirty dollars added to the ten per cent. would not be very much.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is ten dollars on every hundred; it advances.

Mr. SUMNER. Take a very valuable painting when the price is thousands of dollars.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Ten dollars on the hundred would amount to a pretty large sum.

Mr. SUMNER. Still it is only ten per cent. The point on which I was when the Senator interrupted me was this: that there are many maps and engravings of very great value from their rarity; $50, $100, $200, $500 are sometimes paid for these rarities. Now, the question is whether we will make the person who is disposed to purchase one of these works of art—such they are—pay an additional tax of fifteen per cent.

Mr. CONNESS. Whether we will cheapen them or not?

Mr. SUMNER. As the gentleman from California happily puts it, the question is whether we will cheapen them or not. I say cheapen them; I say bring them into the country, and be grateful to those who do bring them into the country. Now, I hope that the Congress of the United States, in this year of light, will not set up a Chinese wall against any such acquisitions. Let us invite them; let us receive them with open arms.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, all the necessities of life are highly taxed by this bill. Every man pays a tax upon the salt that he uses. Every man pays a tax upon the bread that he and his family consume. Every man pays a tax upon the clothing of himself and his family. And now it is proposed, notwithstanding the necessities of the country, to demand high taxes upon these necessities of life to exempt what are luxuries to the rich in the country. I consider that an offensive discrimination against the people who are not able to purchase these valuable books and these fine paintings to which the Senator has referred. I appreciate the argument which he advances. I know how much advantage it is to the country, how much it would tend to improve the intelligence and taste of the country to have these valuable books and paintings introduced free of duty; but, sir, the necessities of the country require that we should raise a revenue, and I say that where ever it is practicable the duties should rather be imposed upon luxuries and the elegancies of life than upon the necessities and those things which are of universal consumption. It is upon that ground that I oppose this amendment and all such amendments. There is a great burden of public indebtedness upon the people of the United States, and every tariff, as far as practicable, should equalize that burden upon all classes, and not undertake to exonerate one part of the community and add to the burdens of another, and particularly exempt those who are best able to pay duties.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, there is no question of the exemption of those who are best able to pay these duties; it is simply a question of a tax on knowledge. The Senator by his system would shut these out from the country and would say, "Hail to darkness!" Let me say, "Hail, holy light!" I do not wish to repeat what I have so often said in this Chamber; but the argument of the Senator has been made here again and again, and heretofore as often as it has been made I have undertaken to answer it. He says we put a tax on necessities now—on the food that fills the body; on the garments that clothe the body. Very well; we do. I regret that we do. I wish that we were in a condition to relieve the country of that taxation. But does not the Senator bear in mind that he now proposes to go further, and, in going further, to depart from the great principle which governs our institutions from the beginning of our history? We have had education free; in other words, we have undertaken to fill the mind and to clothe the mind at the public expense. We never did undertake to fill the body or to clothe the body at the public expense. I, sir, as a lover of my race should have been glad could the country have clothed the body and filled the body with food at the public expense. I should have been glad if it had society been in such a condition that that visionary idea could be accomplished; but we all know that it is not. Let us then be practical and stand on the ancient ways; seek the principle which governed our fathers, which enters essentially into republican institutions, and that principle I say is, that education and knowledge, so far as practicable, shall be free.

In order to make education and knowledge free you must so far as possible relieve all your books of taxation. I have already in what I said a moment ago said that I did not propose to interfere with any of the practical interests of the book trade; and where those interests are out of the way I insist that the great principle of republican institutions should be applied. This is my answer to the Senator from Oregon. I do not think that he has adequately considered this question. He has not brought to it that knowledge, that judgment which always commands my respect as often as he addresses the Chamber. He seems to me to have spoken hastily. I hope that on the present occasion he will withdraw or at least relax his opposition and think of the subject hereafter, and range himself, as he must, I know, with his large intelligence eventually, on the side of human knowledge.

Mr. CONNESS. In view of and in presence of these two angels of light and of darkness, I might reasonably be expected to be silent; but although I am complimented by being in such presence, I am not pleased with the disposition made of, and the location of, the angel of darkness on the Pacific coast, (I feel a little interest in that region,) while the angel of light is located, as my friend from Maryland [Mr. CRESWELL] suggests, at the "hub of the universe;" but I was going to locate him at Cape Cod. [Laughter.] The Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] suggests that they are respectively at the Orient and the Occident. The thing is capable of infinite illustration as presented. But, sir, to come to the facts on this subject: if we follow out the principle suggested by the honorable Senator who represents the excellent angel I do not know where we should stop. I should like to have the country have all the advantages that are promised it under this amendment and like provisions; but really in face of the taxes with which the country is burdened, with which the industries of the country are borne down, it does appear to me to be not wise, nay, in the face of our constituents and their needs, not in good taste at this time to admit luxurious articles free of duty. I join with the honorable Senator, to some extent at least, in the enjoyment of the articles that he proposed to admit free of duty; but I cannot vote for it under present circumstances; and I hope the Senator will not travel so far in the regions of light and knowledge that his friends who belong to the same party shall not be able to keep within reasonable reach of him.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, it is because I hearken to the needs of my country that I make the proposition I do. I am not to be led aside by the picture the Senator draws of other necessities. Let us respect all the necessities of the people; but among the foremost necessities are those of public instruction, and it is of those I am an humble representative on this floor. The Senator from California may if he chooses treat that representation with levity; he may announce himself an opponent of the policy which I would try to establish for my country; he may set himself against what I insist is a fundamental principle of republican institutions, that knowledge should not be taxed; he may go forth and ask for a taxation on books and on public libraries, and if he chooses let him carry the principle still further and tax the public school. Let him do that to be consistent with himself. I hope that he will allow me, so far as I can, to speak for what I believe to be the true need of the country.

Mr. CONNESS. When we come to speak of needs, there are needs of many kinds. We have been treated to-day by the Senator to a speech to which I have listened certainly with great pleasure, as I always do to the eminent Senator. He has called the proposition he has put before the Senate "a fundamental principle." Well, sir, there is a great deal in a name. Now, it appears to me that if he had not breakfasted this morning we should scarcely have been treated to so good a speech; and that breakfast, although it comes as a matter of course, may also be regarded as a fundamental principle. I think it is; and it is the basis of the excellent speeches we have received from the Senator. We tax nearly everything that that fundamental principle was made up of; and I presume the Senator pays his proportion of that tax. Because the graces of God come commonly to us we should not therefore forget them, nor forget to enumerate them, nor forget to take exact cognizance of them, nor constantly be kept in the dazzle of the light and splendor of those things that charm the mind. There are other considerations, though made common to us all by constant use, quite deserving of our consideration.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not choose, so far as I am concerned myself, to allow the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts to go without a response. He likens his proposition to the policy of supporting the common schools, and intimates that we who oppose his amendment should oppose the free-school system in the country. Sir, there is no comparison. It is not the same case at all. The common schools are to give an education to all the people, a system in which everybody has a benefit. But take the other case by which he illustrated his argument. He as a learned gentleman desires to purchase from Europe a rare map, published before the year 1840, costing fifty dollars, for the benefit, not of the common masses of the people, but for the gratification of his own individual cultivated taste. Now, I want to know, when everybody is being taxed, why he should be allowed to bring in a foreign map for his personal use and gratification, and not at all for the benefit or gratification of the people, free of duty, while the laboring man pays a tax upon the coat in which he labors. If he takes the school-books, I say to him that the school-books are not brought from abroad; they are from the American mind and the American press. These rare productions that he speaks of are not for the benefit of the masses, but for the gratification of the few; and his proposition is simply to exempt from taxation an intellectual luxury, thereby throwing an undue proportion of the burdens of Government upon the masses of the people.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SUMNER. I now move to place books printed prior to 1840 on the free list, by inserting on page 99, between lines thirty and thirty-one of section eighteen, the words: "books printed prior to 1840."

Mr. LANE. I shall vote against this amendment as I voted against the amendment admitting free of duty books and charts for public libraries and college associations. I shall vote against this for the same reason, and for a still stronger reason, that it may interfere materially with the publishing houses of our own country.

The Senator from Massachusetts takes the ground that all those who vote against this exemption vote to lay a tax upon knowledge. That is a mere ad captandum expression, meaning nothing when it is analyzed. Every cent of tax that we assess here upon any article is precisely as much a tax upon knowledge as is the tax upon books. You tax the farming implements that the farmer uses; you tax every article of necessity that he uses; you thereby render his ability to educate his children less, and in precisely that proportion these are taxes upon knowledge. Every single tax that you assess is a tax upon knowledge, inasmuch as it lessens the ability of the parent to educate his child.

This is a tax upon knowledge, we are told, because books and maps and charts will be more expensive if the tax is levied than if they are admitted free. That is doubtless true; but every duty on any other article, the tax on which lessens the ability of the parent to educate his child, is precisely as much a tax upon knowledge as this.

The necessity for the tax grows out of the national debt. We have to provide for it in some way. The most just and equitable way is to exempt no class, to tax all; and we shall have to resort to that if the public credit is maintained. For this reason I voted against the amendment of the Senator from Vermont; and I shall feel compelled to vote against this amendment, not because I want to vote a tax upon knowledge or a tax upon anything else if it be not necessary and if we could avoid it; but when taxes are necessary to sustain the Government I shall oppose every single class-exemption; and I warn the friends of the bill that if they shall go on excluding from taxation this class and that class and the other, leaving the burden to fall upon the people who have no representatives specially charged to look after their interests, I shall vote against the whole bill. I think the taxation should be apportioned equitably and justly, and the man or the association or the college or library able to buy rare books and rare charts and rare pictures is the very one who should pay taxes in preference to all others, because any tax that lessens the ability of the people for general education is as much a tax upon knowledge as this. I shall then stand by the bill as reported by the committee; but if this class-exemption is carried out, and carried much further, I shall be compelled, as a matter of protection to those whom I represent, the honest, humble, hard-working people, who are taxed to the very earth already, to vote against the whole bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope this amendment will not be adopted. It will be noticed that we have already adopted an amendment allowing associations for literary, scientific, and artistic purposes to import free of duty foreign books in good faith for their use. If they want rare books and valuable books they will under that provision import them and place them in their libraries. I am opposed to going further and exempting individuals who are able and may choose to import these old and valuable rare books from all duty upon them. I agree with what has been said by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. LANE] upon that subject. The duty as already laid is very low, only fifteen per cent., and I hope the Senate will adhere to the position which the committee have taken on the subject.

Mr. SUMNER. The argument of the Senator is that because the duty as already laid is low, therefore we had better adhere to it. Now, every argument for making the duty low is equally strong against having any duty on the subject. There is no reason that could have influenced the committee in favor of reducing the duty, which is not equally strong in favor of removing the duty.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will excuse me. We have to look to revenue. If you raise the duty very high on rare books they are not likely to be brought in, so that then we should not get revenue. We thought that a low duty might encourage importation and give revenue; but if you made them free we should get no revenue.

Mr. SUMNER. Now, the Senator declares that the object is revenue; but the revenue that will come from that source is very small; it is not large enough to compensate for the mischief that it will cause. That certainly is the conclusion which I am obliged to adopt from such opportunities as I have of investigating the question.

But the Senator from Indiana [Mr. LANE] has reminded us that he is against class-legislation, and he wishes to have all the interests of the country taxed. Sir, I believe all the conclusions of the best experienced in taxation are that we should seek as much as possible to diminish the object of taxation. Just in proportion as nations become experienced in imposing taxation do they limit the objects to which the taxes are applied. It seems to me we are strangely insensible to that warning of history. We seem to be groping about and seizing hold of every little object, every filament, if I may so express myself, which we can grasp in order to drag it into the sphere of taxation.

Now, I think we should be better employed if we declined to tax a large number of articles which it is proposed to tax, and brought our taxation to bear on a few important articles which we should make contribute substantially to the resources of the country. The tax that is now proposed will contribute nothing of any real substance to the resources of the country, while to my view it is not creditable. That is my opinion. I say it frankly; I cannot help saying it, because I think it. It is not creditable to the civilization of our age, and least of all is it creditable to the civilization of a Republic?

That is my conviction. As often as I have thought of this question, I cannot see it in any other light; and I do think that money derived from such a quarter can only be vindicated on the principle of the ancient Roman emperor, who said, "Money from any quarter, no matter what it may be, for money does not smell." Now, it were better if we, instead of hunting up all of these several articles for taxation, running them down like game in order to bag them in the public Treasury, should confine ourselves to the great subjects, and make them productive. There are enough of them, and we can have revenue enough. Let us have all the revenue that we want; and having it, let us be hospitable to literature, to knowledge, to art; and now let me say, let us be hospitable to books, because through books you will obtain what you desire in literature, in knowledge, and in art.

Mr. HOWARD. If the principle which the honorable Senator insists upon be a correct one, I desire to ask him why he would limit the subject to the year 1840?

Mr. SUMNER. If the Senator wishes I will answer. I have already stated that I took the date of 1840, because I found it in the bill; it had been selected by the committee as the dividing line between different scales of taxation. I supposed, therefore, it had passed under the consideration of the committee, and I did not think it worth while to interfere with it. Then, as the Senator will see, between now and 1840 is near a generation; and it seemed to me that any work published one generation ago was so far removed that it could not interfere with what I call the practical interests of the book trade.

Mr. HOWARD. If the general proposition be true, that books imported into this country ought not to be taxed, the principle applies as well to books published since 1840 as to books published before 1840. I can see no reason whatever for drawing the line of demarkation between the two descriptions of books in the manner suggested by the gentleman's amendment. But, sir, in point of fact there is no such principle according to my judgment. I do not see any good reason in politics or morals why we should exempt books published in a foreign country entirely from taxation. I do not think there is any. If there be any force or validity in the idea of protection to our own domestic industries, there is as much necessity I apprehend for extending that protection to American publishing houses as to any other branch of American industry. Why not?

And, sir, I do not admit the principle that a tax upon books or maps or engravings is a tax upon knowledge. It is very easy, and there is no gentleman more dexterous at it than my friend from Massachusetts, to invent phrases; and he has furnished the Senate with a repetition upon this occasion of what he has done heretofore very frequently, by using this term, "a tax upon knowledge." I agree entirely with the views taken of this matter by my friend from Indiana, [Mr. LANE.] We tax almost every article that enters into the comfort and even subsistence of the school-boy or school-girl who attends the primary school, and the gentleman from Massachusetts makes no complaint against this; but when we undertake to tax foreign literature, books published in a foreign country, none of which ever finds its way into a common school in this country, the Senator from Massachusetts makes the outcry that we are taxing knowledge! I do not so understand it.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator does not mean to do me injustice; but of course he does not remember my votes here. I have always voted and spoken against any tax on school-books. We have taxed in our internal taxation school-books. To my mind the tax was odious; it was almost like the word "white" in a constitution.

Mr. HOWARD. I had not stated that the Senator from Massachusetts was in favor of taxing school-books, but I can draw no distinction myself, so far as taxation is concerned, between the ordinary means of subsisting a family and the means of giving that family an education at the common school or anywhere else. The phrase "a tax upon knowledge" has in my view very little meaning, and still it is one of those pleasant phrases which undoubtedly will have its effect in some quarters upon the public mind. If we are to raise a tax for the purpose of paying our debts, I am in favor of imposing that tax as equally as practicable upon all the branches of industry and production in the country; and I see no reason under Heaven, and think there is no reason, why foreign books published before 1840 or after 1840 should be entirely exempt from taxation. As to the amount of revenue to be derived from that source, I know but very little about it. I know, however, that some revenue would be derived from it, and that is sufficient for me.

The Senator from Massachusetts says that such a tax is a tax upon knowledge. Well, sir, the knowledge of books and the use of books is not the only knowledge pertaining to the human mind. Books are not the only means of knowledge communicated to the mind. Mathematical and philosophical instruments in the world of science are as necessary, let me say to the learned Senator, as books, and still this bill now before us imposes upon philosophical and mathematical instruments a duty of thirty-five per cent. ad valorem. Why does not the Senator complain of this? Is it not as necessary that our colleges and our lecture-rooms should be supplied with mathematical and philosophical instruments as that their libraries should be filled with foreign publications?

Mr. SUMNER. I intend to move an amendment on that point.

Mr. HOWARD. I dare say the Senator will move it. I should expect it as a matter of course; it would be entirely in harmony with his other motions; but I shall vote against all such motions, as I do against his motion to exempt maps and charts and engravings. The thing, in my mind, is absurd, and I shall therefore vote against his contemplated proposition as I shall against his pending one.

Mr. RAMSEY. We were told yesterday by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] who is a member of the Committee on Finance, and has had some connection with this tariff bill, that the raising of revenue by increased duties on imported goods is not a matter of choice, but a matter of necessity; it is the tax which the patriotism of the country is called upon to pay to its necessities; and hence all the industries of the country must be taxed. The poor man in all his consumption and in all his avocations is compelled to contribute to these necessities caused principally by the derangement of the currency and the large internal taxation. This may not be so plain to many of our people who are called on to contribute their respective proportions, small though the mite of some may be, to the revenue which this bill provides for. It is not very plain to my own mind after listening to the argument which we heard this morning from the honorable Senator from Iowa, [Mr. GRIMES.] It is evident from what he said that he, at least, has serious doubts about it.

But, sir, there must be a large, intelligent, and wealthy class in this country who ought to appreciate this fact, and I think it is that body of men that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts in his several amendments here this morning is representing. They, if any of our people, ought to appreciate the necessities of the country above all others; and if they are exempted it would seem to be very unfair to tax the less intelligent and less favored portion of the people. If any sacrifice is to be made, they can appreciate the necessity and are better able to endure it, and they ought to be the last to be putting in this perpetual claim for exemption.

I am the more strongly fixed in these views by a further reason: that as the revenue is necessary, if we exempt the rich we put greater burdens on those who are not so well able to bear them. A wise adjustment of the obligations which all owe to the Government to sustain it and to relieve it from the indebtedness which unfortunate circumstances have compelled it to incur is not only consistent with the lightening of the burden of those who have been less favored by fortune, but it is a duty on statesmen to see that labor is not crippled in its exertions while wealth is insensible to the hand of Government. Exempt the rich and injustice is done to the poor; for in that proportion you increase their taxes and depress their energies. You magnify the claim of the Government upon them and diminish the means by which they earn the necessities of life. If inequality be admitted the discrimination should be adjusted in proportion to the means to contribute, property should pay for its protection, and industry should be fostered and labor cherished.

With these views I shall certainly vote against this amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, as I have voted against the others which he has proposed to-day.

Mr. SUMNER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I desire to ascertain if I am correct in the memorandum I have made with reference to this matter. I understand that the present tariff imposes a duty of twenty-five per cent. on the books now proposed to be exempted by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Fifteen per cent.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. No; that is the proposed tariff as reported by the Committee on Finance, but the present tariff is twenty-five per cent., I think.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is right.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. By looking at the report submitted by Commissioner Wells it will be seen that in the tabular statement in which he gives the present tariff the rates imposed by the House bill of last year and the proposed rates by his bill these books, which by the present tariff pay twenty-five per cent., are placed in the House bill at twenty per cent., and he proposed fifteen per cent., which rate the committee have adopted. Thus it is apparent that if the bill passes in the form proposed by the committee it is a reduction of ten per cent. on the existing rates of duty on these articles. I think the Senator from Massachusetts should be content with that. If he gets the rate reduced from twenty-five to fifteen per cent., when the taxes on everything we eat and wear are being raised twenty, thirty, forty, or fifty per cent., I think that he ought to be content.

Mr. SUMNER. Personally I am content with anything. I am trying to do what I think best for the people. I may be mistaken in my judgment; and when I see so many distinguished Senators so earnestly differing from me I certainly am led to call in question my conclusions; and yet considerable reflection and some experience in dealing with this question have always brought me around, if I may say so, still more strongly than ever before to the same unalterable conclusion. I feel that in imposing this tax you make a great mistake. The tax is small. When I say that it is a great mistake I mean that it is because it is a bad example, and because just to the extent of its influence it keeps knowledge out of the country. However, I will not say anything more on that head.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 5, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Dixon, Fowler, Patterson, Riddle, and Sumner—5.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cattell, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Poland, Ramsey, Sprague, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—32.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Cowan, Davis, Grimes, Guthrie, Henderson, McDougall, Morrill, Nye, Pomeroy, Ross, Saulsbury, Sherman, and Yates—15.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SUMNER. I now propose to put mathematical instruments and philosophical apparatus, imported expressly and in good faith for any public, scientific, or collegiate institution, on the free list, by inserting on page 102, between lines ninety-eight and ninety-nine of section eighteen, these words:

Mathematical and philosophical apparatus imported expressly and in good faith for any public, scientific, or collegiate institution, incorporated or established by the United States or by any State, city, or town.

Without some such provision the Smithsonian Institution here in Washington, and colleges and other public institutions throughout the country importing philosophical apparatus, will be obliged to pay a tax. That is the whole case.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is a double object here: first, to raise revenue, and second, to protect our own manufacturers.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by inserting after "basswood" in line nine of section sixteen, on page 98, these words:

And fencing-boards of whatever material, from twelve to sixteen feet in length, not more than one inch in thickness, and not more than six inches in width.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to hear some explanation of that.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. In section sixteen it is provided that there shall be a duty of one dollar per thousand feet "on sawed boards, plank, deals, and other lumber of spruce, hemlock, whitewood, and basswood." It is further provided in the same section that "on all other varieties of sawed lumber" there shall be a duty of two dollars per thousand feet, board measure. In the State where I live, it is well known perhaps to all members of the Senate, timber is very scarce. Pine lumber is mainly our fencing material. By the bill as it now stands pine lumber for fencing is taxed at two dollars per thousand feet. If the amendment which I offer shall prevail it will be taxed at one dollar per thousand feet.

It seems to me that this should be done. Fencing the prairie is a very expensive item to those who are making farms upon it. Without fencing we cannot produce grain. In order to fence our lands we must have pine. I do not see why basswood boards should come in at one dollar a thousand and pine boards at two dollars. Let us have the material we use for fencing our farms on the prairie and producing the grain you eat at as low a rate as we can have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to inquire of the Senator if the people of Iowa use imported pine lumber for fencing purposes, or do they use the lumber produced in this country?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. We use pine almost exclusively, a large proportion of which I understand is brought from Canada to Chicago and then sent by railroad to our State. We do not ask that lumber for all purposes shall be thus favored; but it seems to me that fencing lumber alone, that which is essential to us in the production of our products, should be placed as low as any other lumber that is produced. I have shown the Senate the discrimination that is made by the section as it stands; the first clause which I read imposes one dollar per thousand feet on spruce, hemlock, white-wood, and basswood lumber, and excludes that material which we use exclusively for fencing—pine. I propose to insert that in that class.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This matter is interesting to several sections of the country where they wish some protection upon lumber. We have already reduced the duty upon all varieties of lumber in point of fact somewhat from the existing tariff, and that is owing to the fact that so large a proportion of the community are interested in lumber for building purposes as well as other purposes all through the country. My own State is a lumber-producing region. The lumber from the adjacent Provinces of New Brunswick and Canada comes directly in competition with ours. And yet in considering this question, taking the interests of the whole country into view, the duties upon lumber should be placed as low as they can be placed consistent with affording a reasonable protection, considering the different rates paid for labor in our country and in the adjacent Provinces; and they are fixed therefore at the rates specified in the bill. The Senate will notice that on no description of pine does the existing tariff levy a duty below two dollars, and in some cases on some particular varieties it is carried up to three dollars. This bill brings it all down to two dollars.

But the great objection to the position assumed by the honorable Senator is this: supposing that there was any reason to discriminate between fencing lumber and lumber imported for the purpose of erecting houses, it would be very difficult to tell what kind of lumber was used exclusively for fencing and for nothing else; and when the pine lumber was imported it could be used for almost any purpose.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. My amendment describes the lumber fencing-boards from twelve to sixteen feet in length, not more than one inch in thickness and not more than six inches in width.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But when that kind of lumber was got in it could be used for a great many purposes besides fencing. The result might be to cover the West with imported pine lumber nominally to be used for fencing, but which would answer almost every conceivable use for finishing purposes in connection with buildings. It is very obvious that there should be a discrimination between the other kinds of lumber that are mentioned and pine. Pine is the most valuable for building purposes, the most valuable for all sorts of finishing. I cannot conceive why you should give to the farmers of the West a particular benefit with regard to fencing which you do not give them with regard to their houses. The first thing a man who emigrates to the West wants is a building to cover himself and his family and to live in. It is not proposed to relieve him from taxation upon the articles that enter into his house; but when he gets his house built, with everything comfortable about him, and when he comes to fencing in his land when he grows richer, you want to put the wood that he uses for fencing in the lower grade of duty.

The only way in which you can regulate the matter in order to prevent frauds is to describe the particular kind of lumber, so that there can be no mistake about it. The moment you begin to say that lumber of a particular description may be imported for some purposes and not for others, especially pine of the kind the Senator describes, which could be used for finishing purposes to a very great extent, you have no protection whatever.

The only way the Senator's object could be accomplished would be to give a drawback on the ground that fencing was so important that it should be particularly benefited and patronized, and provide that where a man had erected fences with imported pine lumber and could prove to the satisfaction of the collector that he had used it for fencing he might have a drawback. If you carry the system of drawbacks to the prairies, I doubt very much whether, in the state of the collection districts in that region, it would be very easy to avoid the consequences which I have pointed out.

The only distinction, and a distinction which is run always in these bills in laying the duties upon lumber, is to distinguish the different kinds of lumber. Some are cheap, common, and do not pay and cannot pay so heavy a duty as others. Other lumber, like pine, is well known and its uses are well known.

I trust the amendment will not be adopted, because it would create infinite confusion in the collection of the duties; it would lead to innumerable frauds; it would be impossible to draw the distinction attempted to be made, and there is no reason why pine for one purpose should come in at a lower rate of duty than pine for any other purpose; why those who use it to build houses should pay more than those who use it to make fences.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I certainly should be very glad to have the assistance of the Senator from Maine in reducing the duty upon building lumber as well as on fencing lumber; and if it will secure his support to the amendment I will modify it so as to cover ordinary lumber for building purposes as well as pine for fencing purposes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In that case you might as well take off all the duties, and then our lumbermen would have no protection. That would be the result of it. They are entitled to a reasonable protection.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. This tariff bill, as I understand it, is framed on the principle of endeavoring to give protection to all parts of the country, and do justice to all parts of the country, so far as it can be done in framing a bill of this kind. I listened with considerable interest to the remarks of my colleague this morning, in which he endeavored to show to the Senate that the effect of this bill would be injurious to our people. I am free to say that I am not satisfied on that point, and have not yet determined how I shall cast my vote on the bill. The general tendency of the bill, however, so far as we are concerned, is to tax everything we use, and to afford very little protection to anything we produce, save and except the single article of wool.

Our position, as I before said, is somewhat peculiar with reference to timber. It is scarce, exceedingly scarce with us. We build our houses of sawed logs or lumber; we build almost all our fences with sawed logs or lumber. If, while you are taxing everything we use otherwise so highly, you impose heavy taxation on the material out of which we build our houses and our fences, I am afraid our people will become restless under the operation of such a bill.

The Senator from Maine thinks that my amendment would open the door for the introduction of pine lumber for building purposes. I think that cannot be. In looking over the quotations of lumber in Chicago and elsewhere I find that "fencing" is a distinct description of lumber by itself. It is recognized in the trade, and my amendment describes the particular quality of lumber, the particular length, and particular width. It is true, lumber of the same description may be used for flooring; but it will be a great relief to our people if the amendment I have offered should prevail.

There is another consideration. Our pine forests are becoming rapidly exhausted. The pine forests of Michigan and Wisconsin are becoming rapidly exhausted. Where shall we get lumber? Will it not be the part of wisdom to encourage the introduction of lumber from other countries and save our own?

It seems to me that these considerations are sufficient to justify the adoption of the amendment I have offered.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope this amendment will not be adopted. I look upon the bill as it stands in this respect as too low, and I intended to move that this rate be raised to three dollars instead of two. It is perfectly well known that all the great value of lumber is in the labor and in the transportation. The logs and stumps have merely a nominal value; but while we in the United States are paying to our common laborers two dollars a day; in the British Provinces they are to-day paying but from seventy-five cents to one dollar a day; and two dollars a thousand feet is not an adequate protection to the lumber manufacture. I will await the action of the Senate on this amendment; I had better leave my amendment for another time; but I was going to say that if it was in order I should move now to amend by inserting "three" instead of "two." That motion I shall make at the proper time. Our lumber dealers assure me that three dollars is as low a duty as ought to be affixed to lumber. I hope, therefore, that this motion will not prevail, and give notice that I shall move an increase.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I wish to remind the Senate simply of this fact: that if protection is due as a matter of right from the Government to any interest, any business, any enterprise in the United States, it is probably due as much to this business of lumbering as to any other. It ought to be remembered that the Government has sold in certain portions of the country immense tracts of land valuable for no purpose in the world except for the timber there was on them. Now, the cost of turning that timber into lumber is very much enhanced; every article that is used by the lumbermen is very heavily taxed; the price of labor is very much increased; and still in most portions of the country where this timber is it is quite contiguous to large forests of the same kind of timber in Canada, which is being manufactured into lumber without experiencing these difficulties. The effect, therefore, of leaving this particular industry without protection is to substitute in the American markets the Canadian forests for the forests you have just sold and got the money and put it into the Treasury. I do not think that is the right thing to do.

This duty is but a very inconsiderable one, as has been said by the Senator from Michigan, and when applied to the particular variety or description of lumber which is included in the motion of the Senator from Iowa it is quite insignificant. His motion has reference to lumber described as six inches in width and of an inch in thickness, those kinds of lumber which are used for fencing and flooring, among the most valuable descriptions of lumber in the market, selling higher than any other description, except that which is denominated clear, and much of this is clear. Though flooring is often one and a quarter inches in thickness, it would include all the varieties of lumber which are used in sheathing, flooring, and fencing.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Sheathing is over six inches wide.

Mr. HOWE. No; ordinarily not. Much of it is wider, but sheathing—I mean for close match work—should not be more than six inches in width. While the duty is not at all oppressive upon this variety of lumber, it is the judgment of those engaged in the business that it is bringing them in very severe competition with manufacturers on the other side of the line to reduce it to so low a figure as two dollars. I certainly hope that the Senator from Iowa will not insist upon the amendment, and that the Senate will not agree to it.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WADE. I move to amend the bill on page 65, section nine, line six hundred and nine, by striking out "sixteen" and inserting "twenty-three;" so as to make the clause read:

On linseed or flaxseed, twenty-three cents per bushel of fifty-two pounds weight.

As is well known to the Senate we have received from Ohio and the adjoining States a great many petitions on this subject, perhaps as many as upon almost any other subject bearing on this bill. It seems to be a universal complaint among our agriculturists and oil manufacturers in the West that they are not sufficiently protected under the provisions of the present law. This is a great and growing interest in the West, and enables them to diversify very much the system of their labor in raising wheat and corn. It gives them another valuable commodity, which, perhaps, under proper protection, would be much more profitable than to be so entirely confined to the two great staples of the West which I have named.

I suppose the object of the committee is, and I know it is the wish of the Senate, wherever they can do it without detriment to the public interest, to protect all interests, and as near alike as they can; but if any interest is peculiarly meritorious, the agricultural interest of the country ought certainly to receive as much consideration in this respect as any other, because when we come to enact a tariff that class of our community, although the most numerous and certainly as valuable as any other, have but very few opportunities to be protected. Now, this article comes in competition with the same article imported from India, a country where labor is exceedingly cheap. Our farmers are compelled to contend with the miserably paid labor of British India, from whence I believe most of the importation of flaxseed comes, and perhaps from some other places; and, therefore, I hope that it will be the desire of the Senate to endeavor to protect this kind of growing labor in our own country.

Let me say here that in our endeavor to raise revenue from customs on imported commodities I fear we are losing sight of another source of revenue to the country, which, with a little encouragement, will be infinitely more profitable. If you will foster these interests so that labor will become profitable in our own country, and permit us, if you please, to monopolize that profitable labor, instead of encouraging it abroad, you will build up interests and wealth here from which you can receive a much greater meed of revenue than you can get simply from importations.

I know gentlemen have spoken in very glowing terms of the prosperity which a country receives from commerce alone, as though commerce was the principal thing to be sought after. Why, sir, unless you encourage all kinds of labor you can have nothing to ground your commerce upon. What kind of a commerce would a people have that had no manufactures and but little agriculture? Could you get rich upon commerce alone? I have heard of two Yankees that got rich in prison by swapping jack-knives, [laughter;] and it would be just about as reasonable to suppose that as to suppose you could build up a great interest by commerce alone. Commerce is well enough, and it is necessary to carry off the surplus production of any country of great commodities. If a superfluity of them is produced by the encouragement of labor in any country, commerce is incident to it and takes place as a matter of course. It comes after, but it never goes before, and never can. Commerce itself is the most barren of all labor in the world; it never produces anything; and although it is convenient to have commerce, especially for the carrying of those commodities that are useful and beneficial to a nation, but which because of its climate and soil are not produced in its boundaries, and although the intercourse of nations upon those subjects is natural and right, yet no nation ever should adopt a policy that will encourage commerce to the detriment of its own productions of the commodities of commerce. Let commerce spring up from the encouragement of commodities produced by the labor of the citizen, and then it is legitimate; then it is right; then I have no objection to it; but when you thrust it in to the detriment of our own industry and our own productions you have begun at the wrong end. The wealth of a nation must consist alone in the products of her labor, and that nation that does the most profitable labor will be the richest nation.

I am not going into an extended argument on this subject; but I ask in this connection that this particular product, which is perfectly congenial to our soil and climate, which can be produced here as well as in India, shall receive adequate protection. Give us an encouragement that will stimulate that labor, and let it all be done here; and as we grow rich upon the products of that labor, tax it and get three times more than you can get from the importations from abroad. That is my doctrine. That I believe is the true system of political economy. I know from the almost universal complaint among the producers of flaxseed that they do not, or they think they do not, receive that meed of encouragement which the nation can afford to them without loss, and in my judgment to great profit, even if you look barely at the sources of revenue alone. If we crash this commodity and make it into oil and grow rich upon it, tax that production at home. That is legitimate; that is proper; then you do not impoverish anybody. But when you adopt a policy that makes the production of it entirely dependent upon foreign labor and importations from abroad you get a small revenue, but you impoverish the nation because you do not encourage that kind of labor.

I do not wish to extend these remarks. What my colleague said in the course of the speech that he made on this subject yesterday was perfectly conclusive to my mind that this amendment ought to prevail; and I hope it will for the encouragement of those engaged in this production, not alone in the State of Ohio, for they do not seem to be in any more need of this protection there than they do in the adjoining States where this great and growing article has become one of great importance, and I think should receive the encouragement of Congress.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the subject that has been introduced by the Senator from Ohio is one in which many persons are interested. I had proposed, instead of the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Ohio, to move an amendment making the tax on linseed twenty cents, instead of sixteen, and making the tax on the oil thirty-five cents instead of twenty-three, on the simple principle that as the duty on the seed is raised so that the crusher has to pay more for it, the duty on the manufactured article, the oil, should also be raised so that he may be protected. Of all the linseed crushed in this country I am informed by those who understand the subject that nearly two thirds of it comes from Calcutta and Bombay, and of course this extensive business of crushing linseed must be embarrassed and depressed if the crushers have to pay a high duty on the linseed. The crushers would be perfectly content, I suppose, if the duty had been left where it was. The duty, I think, was ten cents a bushel on the seed and twenty-three cents a gallon on the oil, but then there was a drawback. Now, I notice that the Commissioner, Mr. Wells, in speaking of this subject, says:

"On flaxseed, or linseed, and on linseed oil a large advance is respectfully asked."

He then goes on and considers the subject, and concludes with these remarks:

"It is his opinion, therefore, that the interests of the revenue and of the country generally would be best promoted by leaving the existing tariff rates on flaxseed and linseed oil unchanged."

But this bill does not do that by any manner of means. The crusher was protected under the old bill, for when he exported the cake made from the seed after the oil had been extracted he had a drawback which was equal to five and a half cents per bushel. This bill abolishes that drawback and makes the duty, even if it stood at the same rate, so much higher. Now I am informed that about two million gallons of oil are imported into this country, and about the same quantity manufactured from American seed. The drawback is gone by this bill, and I suppose properly so. The western grower objects that there shall be a drawback on imported seed, for that is the law. The drawback applies to raw material imported into this country and manufactured and then reshipped. They object to a drawback being on imported seed while the home-crushed seed has no such drawback; and I understand that there has been an arrangement made between the western and eastern men, so that about such an amendment as that which I suggest would be agreeable to each party.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Thirty and thirty-five?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Twenty and thirty-five—twenty cents on linseed, and thirty-five cents on the oil. Of course the American crusher does not want so high a duty on the raw material, because he has to get it from abroad; but he does not care so much how high the duty on the raw material is provided there is a corresponding duty upon the oil, so that when he is obliged to pay the duty on the foreign seed he shall not be ruined by having the foreign oil come into the country. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio the acceptance of that proposition: twenty cents a bushel on the seed and thirty-five cents a gallon on the oil.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am a little at a loss to understand the position taken by the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] when compared with that taken by his colleague. His colleague [Mr. SHERMAN] informed us, and he dwelt upon it with a great deal of force, that it was absolutely necessary to raise revenue for the Government, that we should have in a very short time one hundred and forty millions of money to pay in coin annually, beside coin for other purposes, which would bring up the amount to about one hundred and fifty millions, and hence he argued the absolute necessity of imposing duties for revenue; and he argued also the propriety of cutting down the internal revenue charged upon manufactures and various other things in this country. The honorable Senator on my right [Mr. WADE] argues precisely the other way. He says, cut off the revenue; exclude importations; build up a Chinese wall; put your duties so high that foreign articles cannot be imported at all; and then you encourage this great interest, and by and by, when it gets big enough, tax it; put on an internal revenue tax. It seems that the two gentlemen from Ohio who argue this matter do not agree in their general views. With regard to linseed both Senators agree. I believe the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN], after giving us the results of his deliberation on the general question, did make an exception in the case of linseed. "You cannot apply the same rules to linseed that you do to everything else," he says. I do not know that my honorable friend from Ohio would go any further than that.

My other friend [Mr. WADE] also treated us to a dissertation on commerce. There he disagreed with another eminent Senator, a representative from the West. My friend from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] seemed to think that commerce was of some importance to this country. I believe other nations, if I recollect aright, have been pretty much of the same opinion; that if a country would be great it must build up its commerce as well as its agriculture and its manufactures. I think we have heard that Holland made itself for a time the richest country on the face of the earth with nothing but commerce, having the carrying trade of all the world pretty much. I think we all understand, too, that no nation encourages its commercial advantages or nurses them to a greater extent than England at the present time. It has now become the carrier of pretty much the whole world. We were so a little while ago, of a large portion of it at any rate, but we have dwindled down very much, and are dwindling more and more every day.

Now, sir, as I stated yesterday, in framing this bill, which is for the encouragement of manufactures and for the encouragement of agriculture also, we did take into consideration—perhaps we were wrong in that on my friend's principle—that it was of some importance to our character as a nation and our wealth that we should retain something of our foreign commerce; that where it existed it was of consequence and tended to strengthen the arms and encourage the hearts of the people of this country; and I must say, notwithstanding the case of Austria which has been cited, that I think no nation can be really great without encouraging all the arms of national prosperity and of national defense.

I think that is a sufficient answer, so far as I am concerned at any rate, to the argument of my friend against commerce. He seems to think it amounts to nothing; that we should encourage agriculture, and commerce will grow up of itself, and if it does not, it is not of any very great consequence. I differ with him entirely in his views on these subjects; and while I would not encourage one largely at the expense of the other, I really believe it is advantageous to hold on to all.

Now, sir, a word with reference to this question of linseed. My friend does not propose to raise the duty upon the oil, but to put the duty upon the seed, the original article, at the same rate with the duty on the manufacture, both at twenty-three cents, because it stands on the oil at twenty-three now. Senators may just as well understand that in the first place we want some revenue. The House, I believe, put the duties up to twenty-three and thirty cents, if I recollect aright.

Mr. WADE and Mr. SHERMAN. Both the same.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I thought the rates were twenty-three and thirty cents, and I think now I am right.

Mr. WADE. I want them both on the same footing.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I know the Senator does, and he wants them on the same footing for this simple, selfish reason: that the trade of crushing seed and manufacturing oil on the sea-coast may be utterly destroyed for the benefit of the crushers of seed and the manufacturers of oil in the West. That is the simple truth about it; and there is no possibility of getting rid of it, in my view.

Mr. WADE. Your view is a very charitable one!

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is the fact. They claim to have the only thing in this tariff—the Senator cannot point to another one—in which an article out of which a product is made is taxed precisely at the same rate with the article manufactured from it, which is contrary to all the principles of the tariff as carried out in every other article, contrary to every other provision in it from the beginning to the end. Linseed is the only one where this is demanded. Why? For what other reason?

Now, let us look at the protection which the West gets so far as linseed is concerned. Take it at sixteen cents. We did have a drawback upon the foreign seed, or I should rather say on the product of the foreign seed. The gentlemen of the West objected to that, not on revenue grounds, not upon any ground except this: "You can export your cake that is made from linseed, what is called the oil-cake, and get a drawback amounting to about five cents or four and a half cents; while ours, being a native production, cannot be exported, and we cannot get the drawback; therefore it does not cost you so much as it costs us." Very well; we have yielded to that and struck off the drawback. Now what more do they get? They get ten cents upon every bushel of seed, or upon every gallon of oil. It costs that to carry, if they should attempt to carry, a bushel of seed from the sea-board to the West—to Cincinnati. They get their ten cents protection there. But the crushers of the West say, "It is a native production: we can raise the seed: you are bringing in seed from abroad, and we want to put it precisely upon the ground that you cannot manufacture except at such a disadvantage as will enable us to afford to send the oil we make down to the sea-board, and thus tax you with the additional sum that it costs to carry it;" because that is the result of it inevitably.

Now, let us look and see how it stands. There are some other people interested in this question. My friend from New Jersey says that these two interests have come together and agreed upon twenty and thirty-five cents.

In my judgment that is a little too broad a distinction; it should be twenty and thirty if anything. I do not know that I should object to that except that there was another party interested, which gentlemen seem to forget, as the wool-growers and wool-manufacturers forgot that there was a certain other party that was not represented in their convention larger than theirs, but which does not keep its agents always in the field, and that was the consumer. So here, what is this oil used for? It is used for paints all over the country wherever any paint is used, for every man's house, inside and outside, for all purposes, for everybody. It strikes me that that being the case, it is well to consider that the consumer has some interest in this question as well as the crusher, or as well as the man who grows the seed. That the honorable Senator from New Jersey did not take into consideration. I do not think, however, that the rates suggested by him are very unreasonable, except that they add just so much to the amount of expenditure which every man must be at who has occasion to use the article.

Then, sir, would it be reasonable for the West to claim, as they do, that they have a right to have duties imposed that shall give them the power to furnish this article exclusively by bringing up the oil and the seed and putting them upon the same level, and thus giving an advantage to those who have the seed at their own door by putting the duties so high on the seed that they may be able to send the product of their industry down upon the sea-board and charge every man there with the additional expense of the transportation? because that is the amount of it. My answer to all that is, that each section of the country is thoroughly and perfectly protected against the other as the law stands. The western crusher sends his cake abroad. We have taken off the distinction there. He sends it now at just as much advantage as the man of the East does; but neither party ought to be charged for the benefit of the other with the expense of the transportation of the seed from one section to the other. What is grown in the West can be used in the West, and there has not come a time yet when it could more than meet the great and growing demand for it there. It is not sent probably to any extent to the East. What is manufactured in the East is not sent to the West, and does not interfere with their sale there in any particular.

Why, then, should this discrimination be made against the large amount of capital that is already invested in the manufacture at the East, merely for the benefit of pushing the growth to a greater extent in the West? It looks to me like a selfish demand. Both are prospering. There is the answer to the whole. There is no complaint. There was no complaint before our committee. There was no pretense before our committee that the business of growing seed was suffering in the West, or that the business of making oil was suffering in the West. Oil commands very high prices both East and West. This last year there has been a large importation, because they were caught with not enough to be able to supply the country; but as a general rule we have had no complaint. Why, sir, I asked the question of a crusher—the only one who appeared before our committee—whether there was not a rapid and sufficient sale for all the seed raised in the West, and he admitted that there was. This proposition does not come from the grower of the West, from the farmer, except as he is induced to sign these petitions for the benefit of the crusher. It comes from the crusher who wishes to monopolize the business. That is the true statement of the fact with reference to it.

All admit—there is not a pretense to the contrary, because I questioned the gentleman who appeared there before the committee on the subject—that the business is flourishing at the West, both of growing seed and of manufacturing oil at the present day. He would like to have more protection; and so would they all. It proves what I said yesterday, and is one illustration of it, that you cannot leave the framing of a tariff to the manufacturers alone; it is out of the question. I know that every Senator feels under obligation to make an effort, at any rate, to express the views and carry the points of a large interest in his own section of the country; but after all it is for the Senate to consider whether there is any such suffering as calls for anything of the kind.

Now, sir, the hundred vessels engaged in the India trade bring more or less of the India seed. It makes a little more oil, I am told, to the bushel than the western seed—about one pint; where one makes two gallons the other makes two gallons and a pint. The difference is not very great, at any rate. I think the advantage of having the seed grown at your own door and bought as you wish to get it is sufficient to counterbalance that.

I have stated the views which the committee entertained. They looked at this matter with a great deal of care. They heard testimony upon it. They waited several days before deciding upon it in order that a gentleman who wished to be heard might come before them, to whom I have alluded, and he failed to convince the committee by any statement of fact. He seemed to be very frank and honorable in admitting what was true as to the state of facts. But taking what he stated, the result was on the mind of the committee as I have said; and with the yielding of the point, which the manufacturers on the sea-coast very strenuously objected to as very injurious to them, of the drawback upon the cake we thought that the matter was left in a fair condition.

Mr. WADE. I certainly do not wish to prolong the discussion on this subject, but I do not like to rest under the imputation of acting upon merely selfish views. The gentleman himself has raised this sectional question. I do not know that I alluded in my remarks either to the East or the West, the North or the South. I stated some general principles that I thought were right and sound in political economy. I thought those principles applied to the question under consideration and favored my side of it. The Senator differs entirely from me on fundamental principles, I find.

I do not disguise the fact that I am what is called a protectionist. I will, so far as I can do it without detriment to the interests of the country or to any particular interest, protect the labor of our own citizens against that of any other nation in the world. If that be selfishness, I confess that in my progress I have not outgrown it. My first duty I conceive to be to my own country, and where protection comes in question or competition between the interests of my own country and a foreign country I am just so selfish as to prefer my own.

The gentleman also said that I was not only very selfish, but that I ridiculed the idea of the commerce of nations, and he cited some very prosperous countries that he supposed had become rich and powerful by commerce alone. Now, sir, that was a caricature on all that I did say. I said that commerce was a very good thing, a necessary thing to a prosperous nation, but that a nation that was not prosperous at home could never have any commerce; that it could have nothing to make commerce out of, unless in exceptional cases, as where a nation happens to be so situated between belligerents that on principles of international law it may become, as Holland did for a time, the carrier of the world, and as we did prior to the war of 1812. When Europe was in a blaze of war, and we were almost the only neutral commercial nation in the world, we did very much prosper by being the carriers of all Europe, and almost of the world; but that was a temporary condition springing from a peculiar state of circumstances that does not occur once in a century. For a gentleman to base himself upon that as a settled principle of political economy, that you must legislate to secure the carrying trade of the world, is a principle that I do not recognize as sound.

I said nothing detrimental to commerce. I said that while different nations and different climates produced commodities that were consumed in all, commerce would spring up, and was legitimate and right upon those commodities; but I did doubt whether a Government would prosper the more because it legislated in favor of commerce in such commodities as she herself was as well calculated by soil, climate, and everything else to produce as any other nation. If you get commerce upon that, it is illegitimate; it is unsound; it is not good political economy.

But then I was selfish! I selfish for asking you to encourage the growth and production of this article of flaxseed! How many of my constituents are personally interested in this trade? Not one where there are a hundred engaged in other occupations. The Senator says I do not regard the rights of the consumer. Sir, are not my constituents, three millions in the State of Ohio, as much consumers of all kinds of products as anybody else? Why am I selfish and not regardful of the consumers? I stand here the representative of as many consumers almost as any other Senator, and I am as regardful of their rights.

But let me say to the Senator from Maine that he argues this question upon an exceedingly narrow basis. I look to the prosperous wealth of the country in the future as well as in the present. I know we have got to look for a large revenue to meet present demands; but I know we shall not prepare ourselves to meet these demands any the better by encouraging the growth and production of commodities that are exceedingly valuable in the quarter of the world the furthest removed from us, and in that way encouraging the miserable, starved coolie labor of India; for that is what we encourage by it. If I am selfish and my principles are selfish principles they are selfish, not for my particular constituents, but for the growth of my own country, choosing between that and a nation as far removed from us as the earth could make it.

Let me say in this connection also that I do not agree with gentlemen who are so desirous of sinking down to nothing the wages of labor. Labor commands no higher reward than I am glad to see it. I hope to God it never will be any cheaper than it is; for now the real manual laborer gets but a scanty portion of that which he earns. I hope the time will never be when he will be less rewarded than he is now. I am not one of those who will adopt a policy that will sink his labor one single cent less than it is now, if I can help it. Sir, on the prosperity of the laborer here depends the prosperity of your country; for, God be praised, we are pretty much all laborers, and I hope we always shall be. I am not in favor of monopolies. I will not advocate nor promote by my vote any doctrine that sinks the wages of the laborer of this country for the benefit of anybody else. I do not know what the price of labor in India is; I presume it is the merest pittance, from what I read in the newspapers this day, that a million of those poor inhabitants, probably engaged in the raising of this very article, have starved to death this very season, and thousands more of them are in that miserable condition to-day; and yet you want to bring their starved labor in competition with ours, and tell me I am selfish because I am not willing you should do it. Sir, I glory in that kind of selfishness.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What I said was, that the proposition was a selfish one, because it was an attempt to crush out all these manufacturers at the East for the benefit of the manufacturers of the West.

Mr. WADE. No, sir; I do not wish to crush out anybody. I derive my opinion on this subject from a great deal of conversation with people interested in it. Of course that is the only kind of proof I could have. I did not have the benefit of the opinion of the crusher who came before you. It seems that there was but one, and he was a very boon-companion, you say; you thought he was a very clever fellow.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I can inform the Senator that he was from his own State, and he was sent for at the request of a western Representative, because it was said that he represented the crushing interest of the West.

Mr. WADE. I do not know what he represented, and I had not the benefit of his advice, come from where he may; but I have conversed with a great many men who appeared to be very candid and not particularly selfish upon this subject, and they believed that the interest of the country and the interest of all concerned, consumer as well as producer, would be promoted by encouraging this production more than you have encouraged it by your bill; that is what they tell me; that is the information I get universally; that is the lesson taught us by the thousands of petitions that have been poured in upon our table and sent before you, [addressing Mr. FESSENDEN.] You say, however, they are not producers of this article, but mere petitioners signing petitions got at the beck of the crushers. I do not know anything about that. They do not say so on the face of the petitions. They seem to be an emanation from our respectable farming interest in the West, judging from the face of the papers. But you tell me that the few crushers got these men to send these petitions without any purpose or design on their part. I do not read them in that light. I believe it was the honest, the respectable farmers, the bone and sinew of our country, that sent you those petitions. Nor do I believe that any interest is to be affected detrimentally by all that I ask; and when you tell me that I stand here particularly for the West I say you have no right to charge me with that. When did I ever give a sectional vote on this floor? When your fishing bounties were up did I ever desert you? Whenever you had before us any proposition manifestly of a local character, particularly for the East, did I ever fail to encourage it when your proposition was right, and I was almost about to say even when you were wrong? And yet I am to be charged with selfishness and sectionalism upon this floor. Sir, you have got the wrong man. Look at the record and see how selfish I have been. I am none of that. I said nothing about the East or the West. I demand no more for the West, to which I belong, than I do for the East, to which you belong. Show me a principle that ministers to the growth and the welfare of this nation and I will not stand to inquire whether it affects particularly the West or the East. There is hardly a principle that we touch here that does affect one any more than the other. The tax on almost any commodity does not light upon the heads of those on whom the tax is first placed, but it diffuses itself all over the community, and if the price is enhanced by it the consumer pays it. When you ask us to tax foreign commodities for the encouragement of eastern manufactures is it selfish in you to demand it? Do we yield to your selfishness when we vote for that? Not at all. We know that at first at least, when we grant a tax upon foreign importations coming in competition with your manufactures at the East, we may for a moment enhance the value of these necessary commodities that you produce, our clothing and other indispensables, that we produce but very little of and you a great deal; but, sir, does it not affect us all alike? It does not stop with your manufacturers of the East, on whom the tax first lights, but we, the consumers of your productions in the West, have to make it good to you, and it distributes itself all over the continent; and you, sir, ought to view it so as chairman of the Committee on Finance, and not view it upon this miserable, narrow principle of saying that a man is selfish because he contends for the protection of an article the product of which may enrich those engaged in it, and the benefits of which will reach into every hamlet in the nation. It is not selfishness; that is not the name. It is but the carrying out of a principle for which I have ever contended.

I know very well there are gentlemen who do not agree with me on this subject. There are gentlemen who think you should open the gates of trade to the whole world, perfectly regardless of all that we have going on at home, regardless of the interests invested in manufactures and everything else, when we know as well as we know we live that the effect will only be to pour our wealth into the arms of foreign nations, without redress and without any hope thereof. Sir, if we are to carry this great debt of ours it must be on broader principles than that; and that is why I argue in favor of building up all the interests that will set everybody in the nation to work, for the product of labor, I say again, is all that there is valuable in any country, and that nation which does the most of it is the wealthiest and can bear taxation the best. Let us adopt those principles, apply them to our own productions and to our own laborers as far as we can, and we shall find very soon that this nation will rise from her depressed estate like a rocket, and be able to bear cheerfully all the taxation that you will have occasion to visit her with. I have no doubt of that.

In the mean time, I am not the enemy of raising revenue from importations as much as you can. I really contend for that upon this bill. Why should I be charged with endeavoring to get rid of foreign importations when my very amendment contemplates a further taxation on a foreign importation, which I believe it can well bear; for I do not believe from all my inquiries on the subject that there is a single interest in the East more profitable to those engaged in it than the importation of foreign flaxseed and working it up into oil? I believe it is an interest that has advantages over almost any other, and can afford to part with some portion of its profits to encourage labor in the same production in the West, if you will have it so, or in the East if, you please, for I limit it to no section. If the eastern people could not raise other productions more profitably than they could this, I doubt not they would engage in it as quick as we would in the West; but your land is more valuable and better adapted to other products, out of which you make more than we can out of this. If it were as profitable you would engage in it as extensively as we do.

But I do not wish to prolong this argument, and I would not have said a word at present had it not been alleged that I was a very selfish man and adopted very selfish principles, and that I was for destroying all the commerce of the world. I say to the Senator again, if you want to promote commerce get something for commerce to operate upon. Have a surplus of everything that other nations want, and commerce, as I said before, will come of itself; you cannot keep it down.

But many gentlemen have spoken of the depression of our foreign commerce of late as though it was incident to or consequent upon some adverse legislation here. I do not think the Senator from Maine would like to admit that he had been a party to a kind of legislation that struck down commerce and had reduced it to its present miserable condition. He has not done so. That is not it. You have but recently emerged from a great war which drove your commerce from the ocean. Nine tenths of all your commerce was done in foreign bottoms, and your own vessels that covered the ocean before were driven from it by the pirates of the South, and thus our commerce was ruined; and our great arch-enemy, taking advantage of this and encouraging the pirates upon the seas, did help to sweep us from the ocean and reduce our commerce to a very low condition compared with what it was before the war.

But do not drag that in as though it were consequent upon some principle that I advocate, when you know, and every man knows, that it sprang from a cause entirely different. Let us stand by our own labor, produce our own commodities, and the Senator's own people up in Maine will furnish the shipping and the commerce to carry all our surplus to market. There will be no trouble upon that score. Your commerce will flourish as it flourished before. But if you adopt a system that encourages foreign labor and brings it in detrimental competition with your own, I tell you as your country thus becomes impoverished your commerce will fail as quick as any other interest. You cannot have that commerce which you think belongs to a great nation unless your country is prosperous, independent of commerce, in producing the commodities out of which commerce grows.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I would not rise again, as I have said all I wanted to say on this particular subject, were it not that my honorable friend from Ohio is laboring under a very great misapprehension, and has poured out a good deal of bellowing indignation upon me for saying what I did not say at all. I did not say that he was selfish, and I did not mean to say he was selfish. I said that the proposition was a selfish one, but I almost in terms excluded him from responsibility for it, because I stated that I knew gentlemen were obliged to defend certain propositions because their people forced them to do so from their interest in the particular matter; and I supposed the Senator was bright enough and clear enough to draw the distinction. I made no charge upon him of selfishness in any shape or form. I trust I know too well what belongs to debate to use language so utterly unparliamentary as that; but I had a right to characterize the proposition, inasmuch as I went on to explain why I thought so, and how it worked. The Senator therefore is entirely out of place in supposing that I made any charge whatever upon him; and he has interested the Senate for half an hour, more or less, in repelling a charge that was never made.

Now, sir, I want to say once for all—I do not mean to argue the matter over again—that I never make a charge of that sort against my honorable friend from Ohio. He is in the habit of telling us that his motives are perfectly pure; that he always acts exactly according to his views of right, and that he is very certain he is right on all occasions; and I am perfectly willing to concede it to him. I concede now and hereafter all that he claims for himself of perfect purity and perfect knowledge of everything exactly as it should be. He cannot claim it any broader or more extensively than I am willing to give it to him.

Mr. MORGAN. If there really was any necessity for the proposition made by the Senator from Ohio for this increase of duty, I would have supported it in committee, and I would support it in the Senate; but there is really no necessity for it whatever. The Senators who represent the western States understand their interest very well, and do not often make a mistake; but I am sure they have mistaken their interest in the proposition that has been made by the Senator from Ohio. Now let us see how this matter came to us. There have been presented to the Senate several memorials, one of which I read:

"The undersigned, consumers of and dealers in linseed oil, respectfully memorialize your honorable committees against any increase of the tariff on foreign linseed, now fixed at sixteen cents per bushel of fifty-two pounds; which tariff, in addition to freight from the East Indies and the other necessary expenses and risk of importation, is abundantly sufficient as a protection to seed-growers in this country; and it is self-evident that as a matter of public policy the tariff on linseed should be kept as low as is consistent with revenue, because the article made from it (namely, linseed oil,) is raw material in the following widely-disseminated branches of business, namely: the manufacture of white lead, oxide of zinc, and all painter's colors; putty, varnishes of all kinds; japanned leather and cloth, floor cloths, and table covers; oil silk, oil clothing, and printer's ink; as well as house, ship, and carriage painting. And it is obvious that an increased duty on linseed would affect the cost of all the above articles, and thereby seriously diminish consumption."

These memorials were presented to the Senate and came from the manufacturers of New York, Newark, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Rochester, Harrisburg, Pittsburgh, Chicago, Detroit, Milwaukee, Buffalo, Albany, St. Louis, and Syracuse. There have also been presented petitions in favor of this proposed increase of duty, one of which I will read:

"We, the undersigned, farmers and growers of flaxseed in the West, would respectfully represent to your honorable body that our climate and soil are well adapted to the cultivation of flax for both seed and lint, and that it prepares the soil better than other spring crop for sowing wheat in the fall; that in their opinion they will be able, if fairly protected against the cheap labor of Russia and India, to grow seed enough to supply the entire wants of this country; but in consequence of the importation of large quantities of foreign seed and oil the market is liable to sudden and grave fluctuations, being frequently depressed to a price that will not pay us for raising it. And we submit that it is not good policy to make us dependent on any foreign country for a crop that can be grown at home. We would, therefore, respectfully but earnestly, pray your honorable body to fix the duty on flaxseed at not less than thirty cents per bushel, and no drawback for cake, in accordance with the action of the House of Representatives at its last session, and thereby make the cultivation of flax in our country a permanent and profitable agricultural interest."

As has been stated by the Senator from Maine, there came before the committee a gentleman from Dayton, Ohio, engaged in crushing seed, and the question was put to him whether any of the foreign seed ever went to the West or in any manner interfered with them, to which he replied, "Not at all." He was then asked: "Does the foreign oil ever come in competition with your product at the West?" "Yes, very largely, and was sold last year in large quantities right in our own neighborhood at forty cents a gallon less than we were producing it." It seemed to me that he made an excellent argument against an increase of the duty on the seed and an equally excellent argument in favor of some increase of the duty on oil. I speak now entirely for the West. His argument was a very good one for increasing the duty somewhat on oil, but it was against any increase of the duty on seed, for the seed did not enter into competition with them at all. Formerly there was a duty of twenty-five cents per gallon on oil, when seed was free. Now it is sixteen cents a bushel; but in consequence of the drawback, which takes off about five and a half cents, it is actually but ten and a half cents. There have been during the last year two million four hundred thousand gallons of oil imported into the United States, and that oil finds its way, as I have stated, to the West and enters into competition with the oil manufactured by the crushers of the West.

Mr. HOWE. What was the importation of seed?

Mr. MORGAN. The importation of seed for the last year was about eleven hundred thousand bushels. If the proposition suggested by the Senator from New Jersey had been twenty cents for seed and thirty cents for oil that would be a little better, very little better, than the tariff as it was before these petitions were presented from the crushers of the various localities that I have mentioned representing that there must be an additional duty on oil or their business cannot be sustained. If the motion of the Senator from Ohio does not prevail, and the Senator from New Jersey will so amend his motion as to make the rates twenty and thirty cents, I shall be satisfied, for one, to give it my support.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It seems to me, Mr. President, that the West are just as much interested in the amendment that I suggest as the East, for this reason: the eastern crusher must at the present time import a considerable portion of seed any way. There is not a supply. They now import two thirds of it. If they are obliged to import the seed and the oil is imported at the same price, of course the manufactories at the East must go down; they cannot compete with the foreign oils. Therefore the West is interested in maintaining these manufactories at the East in order that they may have a market for their seed; and just in the same way the consumers all over the country are interested in maintaining these manufactories at the East, for they create a home competition East and West which keeps oil at a reasonable rate for them. I trust that the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio will not be adopted, and I shall then accept the amendment suggested by the Senator from New York, making the duty twenty cents on seed and thirty cents a gallon on oil.

Mr. MORGAN. And no drawback.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. And no drawback. The drawback is out of the bill now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall detain the Senate but a moment, and that to correct what I think is a misapprehension in regard to the extent of this business. My friend from New York says that the importation during the last year was two million four hundred thousand gallons. It is true it was represented to the Committee on Finance that during the last year the importation of oil was two million four hundred thousand gallons; but it is proper to say that previous to the last year no importations of oil to any considerable amount were made into this country. I have before me the table of the importations of the year 1865, and the amount of oils of this kind brought into the country during the fiscal year 1865 was only fifty thousand gallons, and under the present tariff oils would not be brought here unless there was a vacuum in the market, as there was during the last year. There was an unnatural trade, and it would not be renewed. Probably oils would not under the present tariff be brought into this country to compete with our own.

Now, if I can get the attention of the Senate, I will try to give them the facts, because I think there is no conflict of interest in regard to this matter. We import from India about one million three hundred thousand bushels of linseed and rape-seed. It yields about two gallons and a quart of oil to the bushel. The present duty is about ten and a half cents on the seed, after deducting the drawback, and twenty-three cents a gallon on oil, making a discrimination in favor of the crusher of the India flaxseed in the city of New York of about forty cents a bushel. If the seed is brought into the country in the form of seed the duty is ten and a half cents per bushel; and if the same seed is brought in the form of oil the duty on it, according to the present tariff, is about fifty-one cents; that is, as one bushel yields two gallons and a quart of oil, the duty on the oil in the seed, at the rate of twenty-three cents a gallon, will be equivalent to about fifty-one cents; so that the result of the present law is a discrimination in favor of the crusher of the oil equivalent to forty cents a bushel, which is about the cost of the whole manufacture.

There was great complaint in the western States where this linseed is produced, mainly in Ohio and Indiana, I am told, against this discrimination; and it was also complained—although that is rectified in the present bill—that while all the cake made from either domestic or foreign seed is exported and sent to England, that which was made from the India seed had a drawback, and if they were lying side by side in warehouse in New York the cake made from the India seed was worth a considerable sum more than that made from the American seed, because on the one a drawback was given, and on the other it was not. That, however, has been corrected in this bill.

The duty as it now stands in the Senate bill is sixteen cents on a bushel of seed and twenty-three cents on a gallon of oil. That is a discrimination in favor of the crusher in New York amounting to about forty cents on a bushel of seed. I think that is too much. Whether we look at this question as a question of commerce, a question of revenue, or a question of protection it is too large a discrimination in favor of an industry which yields to the Government of the United States no profit whatever. Not one cent of profit is gained unless it is in the mere carrying trade, and that is done partly in American and partly in foreign vessels.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is there not a profit in the duties we get on the seed?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is so small as hardly to be worth taking into account. It is the interest of the United States, under the present tariff law, to have the oil brought over, because if the oil is brought we get fifty-one cents on the product of a bushel of seed in gold revenue, while if that same oil is brought over in the form of seed all the United States gets is ten and a half cents; so that this is a discrimination against revenue, and it is the interest of the United States to import it in the form of linseed oil rather than in the form of linseed. And this protection is given to a manufacture which does not add anything to the wealth of the country, but simply expresses the juice from the seed raised in India and sends the residuum to England. It is true that in the process it gives employment to our commerce, and if this trade was entirely broken up it would destroy that much commerce; but at the same time it must be remembered that if the American seed was used instead the same amount of money would be paid for transporting that from the place of production to the place of consumption, so that internal commerce would be benefited in the one case while external commerce might be injured.

But it seems to me that this matter might be settled upon a fair and just basis. The House of Representatives after a long discussion, because this brought in conflict in the House the same interests that are exhibited here, finally settled upon the rate of thirty cents a bushel on seed and thirty cents a gallon on oil.

The Senator from Maine seems to speak of that as an injustice to the American manufacturer; but in fact it is a discrimination to the amount of thirty-seven and a half cents a gallon in favor of the American manufacturer. Why? If the oil be brought here it would pay thirty cents a gallon, while if the seed be brought here it would pay but thirty cents a bushel; and that bushel of seed, producing two gallons and a quart of oil, would give to the crusher the benefit of the duty on one gallon and a quart of oil, which is equivalent to thirty-seven and a half cents a bushel. It seems to me this is enough. These gentlemen say it is not enough to sustain their business. I have no doubt that if the duty on the seed was put at the rate fixed by my colleague, twenty-three cents, and a small addition, say thirty cents put on the oil, you would protect every interest of the crusher largely, and you would not materially diminish the employment of our vessels in this trade.

This is not a matter which involves any great principle, but it is a matter of detail which involves a pretty large interest, because the amount of seed brought into the country averages pretty uniformly over a million bushels. The amount produced in the country, as near as we can get at it from the statements of the persons in the trade, is a little over that, although there is some discrepancy between the crushers in the East and the crushers in the West in regard to it. I suppose the domestic production is probably a little in excess of the foreign importation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What the Senator says is right so far as his calculations go; but the same discrimination is as much for the benefit of the western producer as the eastern. If it operates precisely in the way he says it does, they have all the benefit because the duty is imposed and they manufacture the oil, so that it operates to the full extent in each case. It does not operate for the crusher who imports the seed any more than it does for the crusher who takes the seed on the spot where it is grown. But now it is raised to sixteen cents by our bill, so that matter is answered in that way.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have but one word to say in regard to that. The testimony was uniform that, with the exception of last year, the foreign never came into competition with the domestic linseed oil; but last year on account of the want of supply it did reach, so this gentleman stated, as far as Dayton or Cincinnati. The real competition in linseed oil is between that made out of India seed in the city of New York and that made out of western seed in the city of Dayton and some other places where it is made; but latterly the American production is reaching the New York market, and I think that probably with a duty of thirty cents a bushel on the seed it would make a pretty fair competition with oil from the Indian seed along the coast. I do not think it is unjust because even at twenty-three cents it is less than ten per cent. ad valorem. If there is any other interest in this whole bill that is put off with a duty of ten per cent. ad valorem I should like to know what it is. The price of this seed delivered in New York is $2 40, so that a duty of twenty-three cents, according to the proposition of my colleague, would be a little less than ten per cent. ad valorem, which is as low a duty I think as you can find in the schedule.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The answer to that is simply this: the question is how much protection it needs. If it flourishes under a certain percentage that is all it demands. I have no objection, if Senators think it advisable, to raising the duty to twenty cents on the seed; but the objection is to the western producers of oil insisting that the duty on oil should be the same precisely as on the seed, thus giving them all the advantage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I now offer the amendment of which I have spoken, to strike out "twenty-three" in line four hundred and fourteen of section nine, on page 57, and insert "thirty," so as to make the clause read: "on linseed, flaxseed, hemp-seed, and rapeseed oil, and on oil of sesame or bene oil, and on cotton-seed oil, thirty cents per gallon;" and in line six hundred and nine of that section, page 65, to strike out "sixteen" and insert "twenty;" so as to read, "on linseed or flaxseed, twenty cents per bushel of fifty-two pounds."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I believe, if I understand this proposition, it discriminates more in favor of the manufacturer and against the grower of the seed than the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. About the same.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think the tariff, as reported by the committee, fixed a duty of sixteen cents on seed and twenty-three on the oil, seven cents difference. This proposition proposes to put twenty cents on the seed and thirty cents on oil, making ten cents difference.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Both of them need that as against the foreign importer of oil.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think, with all difference to all the gentlemen concerned, that there are two interests that were not consulted in this arrangement which has been made here as much as they ought to be. The one is the revenue of the United States, and the other is the interest of the consumer. I feel entirely disinterested in this question; I do not know that I belong to the East or to the West so far as the controversy about flaxseed is concerned, but I think that an article which is so universally consumed as linseed oil ought not to be made so very expensive by the imposition of this duty.

I heard all that was said upon this subject in committee, and my criterion has been in judging of these matters to decide from the practical facts that were submitted to the committee, and I have not yet been satisfied by any representations made to the committee that this flaxseed interest was suffering to any great extent in this country. Flaxseed, which brought a dollar and some cents before the war, now brings three dollars. There is demand for it and it is raised. Men go about in the country, as I am informed, where the flaxseed is raised and buy it of the farmers and pay large prices for it. It is manufactured into oil. Now, it has not been made apparent to me that this high tax upon seed is necessary to enable the farmer to prosecute the business of raising flaxseed; and if it is not necessary, then it seems to me that we ought to take into consideration the revenues of the country and the interests of the consumers.

Where I find and am satisfied that for want of the necessary protection a certain business is languishing, is suffering, then I find a reason for extending protection; but when the business is a prosperous business, and the only object of putting on a high tariff is to make the men engaged in it richer, then I do not see any particular necessity for the proposed addition. I know that there are conflicting representations upon the subject, as there are on all others; but according to the best information that I can obtain the flaxseed interest is not suffering as much as some other interests in the country; and I know that the crushers along the sea-board here do say (with how much truth I cannot determine; I presume, though, they are entitled to as much confidence as other men who appear before us) that to increase the tariff on flaxseed is to ruin their business; and there is a good deal of reason in the statement to my mind. This seed is raised in the West; it is manufactured into oil there, and people who use the oil on the sea-board must either have it manufactured where they live and where they require it to be used or they must go West and buy of the men who manufacture the oil there; and according to my judgment—I may be mistaken; it is exceedingly difficult to form a correct opinion about it—this tariff, as we fixed it in committee, is as equitable and just as it could be arranged.

Mr. CATTELL. Several of my colleagues upon the Finance Committee have spoken upon this subject. I agree with them that we gave a great deal of time and attention to this subject of flaxseed and the oil produced from it, but it was finally a question of compromise without any one of us being satisfied with the result. The real difficulty in this case is just here: in order to produce oil from flaxseed you must find a market for the oil-cake. Very much the largest part in bulk of the production must be reexported from this country to Europe again, simply because our people have not yet become accustomed to the use of oil-cake as an article of food for cattle. As a consequence, it is absolutely necessary that something a little out of the ordinary course shall be done for the crushers. Under the old tariff the crushers of oil had a drawback as has been stated here, and that really reduced the duty on linseed to ten and a half cents. My own impression was at the time the committee made the report, and is now, that under the present rate of duty the important interests of the linseed crushers on the sea-board cannot live, and that they do need something more; the relative difference should be something more, and the proposition which has been made by my colleague to fix twenty and thirty cents respectively I think is one which could be fairly accepted without doing any damage to the western interest at all, and one which would just about save the interests of the crushers on our shore and really do nothing more. I am perfectly satisfied that under the arrangement of sixteen cents for the seed and twenty-three cents for the oil, withdrawing the drawback, you close our oil factories on the sea-board.

Besides, while I am on my feet I will say in reply to my colleague on the committee, the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] that my impression is that we shall benefit the revenue by putting the duty at twenty cents. As many bushels will be brought into the country under that rate of duty as there will be if you put it at sixteen cents. Consequently we shall be doing two good things: increasing the revenue and permitting the linseed crushers upon the sea-board to exist; and without such an arrangement I do not believe they can exist. Therefore, although I agreed to the report, I feel very much as if I should be glad if the Senate would accept the suggestion of my colleague. I think it is perfectly fair.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to have a division of the question. I believe the pending amendment embraces two propositions. It is therefore divisible.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is one proposition; both branches of it go together according to my idea.

Mr. HOWE. If I understand the facts—and I gather all I know about them from the debate as it has gone on—it proceeds upon the assumption that consumers can stand a tax equal, according to the calculation of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] to sixty-seven and a half cents a bushel on seed, because the eastern crushers are willing to have a tax of thirty cents a gallon imposed on the oil, and that is equal, as I understand, to about sixty-seven and a half cents a bushel on the seed.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWE. I think that is too large a discrimination between the business of crushing in the East and in the West. My only point is that I do not think, in a revenue tariff bill or in any kind of a tariff bill, you ought to make a provision especially for the purpose of bringing this product into the country for the mere object of manufacturing it into oil; and that seems to me to be the view of the proposition submitted by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand the fact to be, that from necessity, two thirds of the seed is imported because the West does not supply it. If they would supply it we should not want to import any.

Mr. HOWE. It is said that two thirds, or at least more than half of this seed, is imported from abroad. Why? Because we do not furnish the amount required; and yet the Senator from Oregon says it is a profitable business, and we have untold millions of acres of land unoccupied. Now, if it were profitable to raise this seed, I think there are men enough out of employ or not in profitable employ, men enough ready here in this Congress, if it was actually a profitable business, to take this unoccupied land and furnish the seed that we want. Wisconsin raises a little of this seed; Wisconsin raises a little wool; but I do not think because I ask not that she, but that the lands of the United States, shall have the right to raise flaxseed for the country that I am open to the charge of defending a sectional interest. I expect, when you get this bill perfected, to vote for it; and yet almost every single article in it that you tax is an article that Wisconsin consumes and does not produce. This happens to be an exception. She does produce something of this; she would produce more of it if it were profitable to produce it. She does not find that it is profitable, or she would produce more, because she has got an abundance of land on which to produce it. While that is the fact, I do not like to be told that you let our lands go unoccupied and our labor unemployed and import two bushels from foreign countries while we produce one at home.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. In the mean time, while the West promises to produce this seed, the eastern manufacture goes down and perishes. We cannot make oil out of the fair promises of the West. If the West would produce the seed, there would be no occasion to import it; but they have not done it and just as the West encourage the eastern manufacture at this period, just so much they benefit themselves by creating a market for their seed hereafter. It is a perfectly plain proposition. Our interests are the same.

Mr. HOWE. Let me say to the Senator from New Jersey that if you put up the duty on the seed to thirty or forty cents a bushel, it does not prevent you from buying it in foreign markets. There is a demand for so much oil here. We must have that oil, and if it cannot be had at one price it will at another. If we do not perform our promise—I do not speak now on behalf of Wisconsin, I speak on behalf of the soil of the United States; it is the lands that I want to be secured in the privilege of raising this seed—if the lands do not redeem my obligation in the first year or the second year, the eastern crushers do not suffer, because they can bring still their seed from abroad, and Wisconsin, which uses your oil, will pay for it. We will pay the penalty.

Mr. CATTELL. But they will import it in the oil and not in the seed. That is the very trouble. As far as the question between the two sections is concerned, we do not care what amount of duty you put upon the seed provided a relative duty is put upon the oil.

Mr. HOWE. Then we are agreed; but as I understand the calculation, the difference provided for in this proposition exceeds very much, according to the calculation of the Senator from Ohio, the whole cost of manufacture, the whole cost of crushing. Whatever that difference is, I am perfectly willing should be provided for. I do not want the oil introduced here, though. The Senator from Ohio says that ordinarily we have only imported about fifty thousand gallons of oil in former years. There was a large importation last year, which he says was owing to peculiar causes. I do not understand it; I am no more an advocate for the importation of oil than I am of the seed; but I do not think either ought to be introduced to the extent that it is said to have been introduced last year.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The duty that is by this amendment suggested on the seed is no matter of interest to the eastern manufacturer at all. That is put in because it is fair. The matter that they are interested in is having the relative duty between the seed and the oil kept so that they can live. That is all.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I have not much, if any, opinion on this amendment; but as the Senate is about to adjourn—

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope not.

Mr. SPRAGUE. That they may have something to reflect on, I desire to say a word. Commerce has been discussed here this afternoon, and the Senator from Maine has defended commerce. Sir, this is a commercial tariff; it is made in the interest of commerce and of the importer. It will be surprising to Senators no doubt to be told that upon cotton goods, instead of an increase of duty, there is a reduction of twenty-five per cent. upon goods that are more produced in this country than any other one quality. Then upon goods a little lighter than those on which there is a twenty-five per cent. reduction there is also another reduction of twenty-five per cent. less than the present tariff. I desire also to state that upon linen goods, lawns, handkerchiefs, and the higher-priced goods, there is a similar reduction of twenty-five cents. The Senator has instanced Holland as being a nation that was commercially prosperous without manufacturing. I appeal to history, which determines the fact to the contrary, that while Holland was most prosperous commercially she was more developed in manufacturing industry than all Europe besides. Sir, I denounce this tariff as a commercial tariff. Instead of increasing duties it reduces duties, and upon interests now hardly able to sustain themselves.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, section twenty-one, on page 107, provides for a drawback on certain articles, namely, "Mowing-machines, reaping-machines, plows, axes, hatchets, scythes, cotton-gins, shovels, spades, hoes, hay and manure forks, chisels, augurs, and carpenters' tools." I move to amend by adding to that list, "fire-arms, swords, and matchets." A matchet is a species of Spanish knife which is very much imported.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope the Senate will not adjourn so early. I think we had better sit another hour or two. We must get the bill through some time. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 10, nays 16; as follows: YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Criswell, Fogg, Harris, Lane, Ramsey, Sprague, Van Winkle, and Willey—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Cragin, Dixon, Fessenden, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Howe, Johnson, Kirkwood, Morgan, Morrill, Sherman, Stewart, Trumbull, Williams, and Wilson—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fowler, Grimes, Guthrie, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Patterson, Poland, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, Sumner, Wade, and Yates—26.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate refuses to adjourn, but the vote discloses the fact that there is no quorum present.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion is not now in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that to-morrow the Senate take a recess at half past four o'clock; and pending that motion, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. FESSENDEN. You cannot order a recess without a quorum.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Ohio to move an adjournment?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is in order.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 24, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

A RECUSANT WITNESS.

Mr. HALE. I rise to a privileged question. I am instructed by the joint select Committee on Retrenchment to submit a preamble and resolution, as follows:

Whereas J. F. Tracy was duly summoned to appear before the joint select Committee on Retrenchment to testify relative to an inquiry directed by a resolution of this House; and whereas the said Tracy has refused or neglected to obey the subpoena duly served upon him: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to produce the body of said J. F. Tracy before the bar of the House to answer for his said contempt.

I have here the process duly returned and personally served.

The resolution was adopted.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KASSON, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill making appropriation for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1868; which was read a first and second time, referred to Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, made the special order for Tuesday next after the morning hour, and ordered to be printed.

CIRCUIT COURTS IN PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. SCOFIELD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill directing a circuit court to be held at the city of Erie, in the State of Pennsylvania; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

DUTY ON WAGONS, ETC.

Mr. DEFREES, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of placing on the freelist wagons, wagon and plow harness, common bedsteads, chairs, and tables.

THE BOUNTY BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, it will be remembered that the Committee on Military Affairs had authority to report back what is known as the bounty bill at any time. I have been waiting patiently for some days now for action of the House upon the reconstruction bill, but I am anxious to proceed and I intend to proceed speedily with the bounty bill, and I now give notice that I will endeavor to report it to-morrow or on Saturday.

PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS OF 1812.

Mr. PERHAM, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, submitted a report in writing in regard to the bill granting lands to the soldiers of the war of 1812; which was recommitted to the committee, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF A REPORT.

Mr. PERHAM, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That five thousand extra copies of the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions on the bill granting pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812 be printed for the use of the House.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. MILLER, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers of Dr. Alcon, copies being left.

DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. WENTWORTH, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That all documents ordered by the present Congress to be published, and which are actually printed before the 1st day of December next, shall be allotted as heretofore to the members of the present Congress, and transmitted to their residences as fast as possible unless otherwise ordered by the members themselves.

Mr. WENTWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The morning hour now commenced, and the House resumed the call of the committees for reports.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE IN TENNESSEE.

Mr. BIDWELL, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported back, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, joint resolution of the House No. 213, to extend the provisions of the acts in regard to agricultural colleges to the State of Tennessee.

The substitute was read, and is as follows:

That the provisions of the act of July 2, 1862, entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," and of the act to amend the fifth section thereof, approved July 23, 1866, are hereby extended and made applicable to the State of Tennessee.

Mr. BIDWELL. I think there can be no objection to the passage of this substitute.

The substitute was agreed to.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution, as amended, to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. LE BLOND. I did desire to ask the gentleman a question before the substitute was agreed to. I see this is a proposition to extend the benefits of the land-grant act to the State of Tennessee; and if I recollect correctly a bill was passed some time ago conferring the benefits of the land-grants upon all States, including all the States lately in rebellion. Some time during this session a resolution was passed denying the extension of this privilege to the States lately in rebellion. If I understood the joint resolution now before the House when it was read, it proposes to extend this privilege to the State of Tennessee alone out of all the States lately in rebellion. Am I correct?

Mr. BIDWELL. If the gentleman is through I will answer him.

Mr. LE BLOND. That is the point I want first to know.

Mr. BIDWELL. I will ask the Clerk to read the bill which passed at the last session of Congress; it is a very short one.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the time in which the several States may comply with the provisions of the act of July 2, 1862, entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," is hereby extended so that the acceptance of the benefits of the said act may be expressed within three years from the passage of this act, and the colleges required by the said act may be provided within five years from the date of the filing of such acceptance with the Commissioner of the General Land Office: Provided, That when any Territory shall become a State and be admitted into the Union, such new State shall be entitled to the benefits of the said act of July 2, 1862, by expressing the acceptance therein required within three years from the date of its admission into the Union, and providing the college or colleges within five years after such acceptance, as prescribed in this act: Provided further, That any State which has heretofore expressed its acceptance of the act herein referred to shall have the period of five years within which to provide at least one college, as described in the fourth section of said act, after the time for providing said college, according to the act of July 2, 1862, shall have expired."

Mr. BIDWELL. Now I presume the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] is familiar with the act of 1862. That act provided that its provisions should not be applicable to a State while in rebellion. In order that there might be no doubt as to the extension of the provisions of that act, and of the act which has just been read, to the State of Tennessee, it was thought proper to pass this special resolution making the provisions of the act of 1862 and the act of 1866 applicable to the State of Tennessee. Whether or not that be the best mode may be a question. If it be not the best mode, in order to clear up every doubt which may exist there certainly can be no harm in this action. If the law of 1862, and the law of 1866 amendatory thereof, do already apply to the State of Tennessee, as well as to all the other States which were in rebellion, then this joint resolution can have no bad effect. Therefore I hope this joint resolution will be put upon its passage now.

Mr. LE BLOND. By permission of the gentleman I would like to add another remark. I understand the original act to apply to all the States lately in rebellion. This joint resolution proposes to put Tennessee in advance of the rest of those States, thus making an invidious distinction between the other States which have been in rebellion and the State of Tennessee.

Now, sir, the original act was for the purpose of advancing the interests of agriculture and arts. It does seem to me that this joint resolution should be so amended as to embrace every State in this Union, and not make any of these distinctions. There is no reason why Tennessee should be made an exception to the State of Virginia or Georgia or North Carolina. Every one of these States, upon a question of this kind at least, ought to be put upon the same footing in regard to the benefits of this land grant. There certainly has been no reason offered by the gentleman why that should not be done. I know of nothing that Tennessee has done which entitles her to more of our consideration than the other States should receive from us.

I believe that this act of 1862 was infringed upon by a resolution introduced into this House some time ago; but whether it has been passed by the Senate or not I am not able to say. I am in favor of giving this privilege to all of the States, to extend it to all which may within five years come forward and signify their acceptance of the terms of the law.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman from California [Mr. BIDWELL] yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. BIDWELL. I will yield to the gentleman for five minutes.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have nothing to say about the other States. If any gentleman thinks the provisions of this law should be extended for their benefit, then let him introduce a bill to that effect. But I protest against the State of Tennessee being at all complicated in any way with any of the other States lately in rebellion. As I have often stated before, she stands in a different attitude, moral, political, and in every respect, from the other of those States. I desire that she shall be heard and judged upon her own merits. She has organized a government which Congress has recognized as one which it is willing in the name of the United States to guaranty; and in consequence of this her Senators and Representatives have been admitted to seats in Congress. This is not the case with the ten other States. Tennessee stands before the country in an attitude as far removed from that which they occupy as

"From the center thrice to the utmost pole."

I desire in behalf of the State of Tennessee and of my colleagues, including the one now absent, who introduced this proposition, that the case of Tennessee shall be decided upon its merits; and let every other State through its advocates or its representatives be heard in the same way and upon the same principle. "Let every tub stand upon its own bottom" is an expression that has more force and justice perhaps than rhetorical beauty. On this principle I hope the House will accept the report of the Committee on Agriculture, adopt this bill applicable to our State; and if gentlemen think it should be extended to other States, let them bring in a proposition for that purpose, and we will consider it respectfully and decide upon it justly; but I do hope that our claims will not be prejudiced or embarrassed by having those ten unrepresented States tied on to a proposition of this kind, introduced for the benefit of our State.

Mr. LE BLOND. Will the gentleman from California [Mr. BIDWELL] yield to me five minutes?

Mr. BIDWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. LE BLOND. Mr. Speaker, nothing that has been presented by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] is sufficient in my judgment to induce us to make an exception in this case in favor of Tennessee. The bill, as I understand, proposes simply that we shall grant to that State an extension of the time in which she may signify her willingness to accept the grant under the law of 1862. Sir, the fact that Tennessee has undertaken to change her form of government furnishes no reason, in my judgment, why this extension of time should be given to that State. In my judgment, it is a matter of no consequence. Laying aside every political consideration, it is no reason why Tennessee should be made an exception. This act of 1862, the time for the acceptance of which it is now proposed to extend, is a benevolent grant of lands to the States and Territories, for the purpose of encouraging agriculture and the mechanic arts. This being the fact, then, even on the theory of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] who declares ten States of this Union "dead States" or "Territories"—and we expect to vote to-day upon a bill based on this doctrine—still, under the act of 1862 those States would be embraced as Territories and are entitled to the grant contemplated by that law. Sir, if an extension of time is to be granted it ought to be granted to every one of the States lately in rebellion. I am unwilling to make Tennessee an exception to the general rule that is to govern those States. All that Tennessee has done in the way of changing her State organization entitles her, in my judgment, to no preference in regard to the grant proposed by the act of 1862. I hold that every one of the ten States now denied representation in Congress is to-day a State within this Union, able to signify, under its present organization, its acceptance of this grant and entitled to receive it. Nothing that any of those States has done should in my view deprive them of the privilege of accepting the tendered grant; and to my mind it is an illustration of the vicious system of legislation prevailing here that this House is willing to strike down the means of communicating intelligence to the people of that country simply because they have been charged with having been in a state of rebellion. Sir, my feelings upon that subject are not going to carry me so far as to induce me to destroy or withhold the means of educating the children in those States because the fathers erred.

Mr. GRINNELL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LE BLOND. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRINNELL. I wish to inquire of the gentleman whether he has seen or heard of any request from those other ten States such as has been presented from the State of Tennessee in regard to this grant.

Mr. LE BLOND. It is not necessary that there should be such a request or application. If you pretend to legislate for the education of the people and sincerely desire that intelligence should be disseminated, why should you not extend the time for the acceptance of the grant so that those States may enjoy its advantages? Why should not the time be extended for the benefit of those States as well as for the benefit of Tennessee? It ought not to be necessary that they should ask before we will do them justice. Why, sir, by this act they propose to hold the children responsible for the misdeeds of the parents. The day for any such doctrine has gone by. They have no Representatives here from those States to ask for the benefit of this act, and the gentlemen on that side do not propose to give them a Representative here to speak for themselves as the gentleman from Tennessee has spoken for his State.

Mr. GRINNELL. Let me ask a question. I should like to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether that is the fault of Congress or of the ten southern States which are not represented here? Did they themselves declare they were out of the Union and aliens?

Mr. LE BLOND. Is it the fault of the children in those States that those States are not now represented? That is the true question, and not whether the adults are not represented. This act is for the benefit of the rising generation, and not for the benefit of those who have grown up into manhood and womanhood. But, sir, the gentleman by this very legislation proposes to inflict the punishment of the parents upon the children that were unfortunately born in the States lately in rebellion.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BIDWELL. I will say a word, and then yield to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. STOKES.]

I wish to say, in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, that I had no idea a simple report from the Committee on Agriculture would reopen the entire question of reconstruction of the southern States. Still I believe that in this manner, by this precise question, the whole question of reconstruction can be settled—the question whether a State is or is not entitled to receive lands donated for agricultural colleges. I believe if a State is entitled to receive that donation at the hands of the Government, then that State is entitled to and should be represented in this Congress. By the act of 1862 it was provided that no State then in the condition of rebellion and insurrection against the Government of the United States should be entitled to the benefit of this land. Now the question would arise as to the precise point of time when the State ceased to be in rebellion against the United States; whether it was the moment Lee surrendered, the moment Johnson surrendered, or any other moment of time since the rebellion began in 1861. That is the question for us to determine.

It appears now to be the opinion of Congress that the rebellion has not wholly disappeared. Admitting that its armies have disbanded, the guerrillas, a considerable portion of its force, have not all retired from the occupation of murdering freedmen and Union men. And I hope, Mr. Speaker, this question will be settled precisely in this way: that whenever a State shall be deemed entitled to receive this donation at the hands of the Government, that moment that State shall be entitled to representation in Congress. I believe that is as safe and speedy a mode as any other to determine this question.

The act of 1862 further provided that no State shall be entitled to the benefits of this act unless it shall express its acceptance thereof by its Legislature within two years from the date of its approval by the President. Did any of the southern States which were in rebellion express their acceptance within two years of the date of this act? If they did not, then they were not entitled to the benefits of its provisions.

The act of 1866, extending the provisions of this same law, made no provision for the States which were not represented in the Congress of the United States; and consequently there is no law upon the statute-book making provision applicable to the States in rebellion except it may be for the State of Tennessee. It makes no provision for any State not represented, and Tennessee even could not be entitled to the benefits of it because she had not expressed her acceptance. This resolution is for that purpose and no other.

Mr. LE BLOND. Let me ask a question.

Mr. BIDWELL. I yield for one question.

Mr. LE BLOND. I ask the gentleman what was the necessity of the resolution that was introduced by my colleague [Mr. DELANO] during this session denying to the States lately in rebellion the privileges under that law until otherwise provided by Congress?

Mr. BIDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I think the first difficulty, as I understand the question, is due to the unconstitutional and unjustifiable action of the Executive of this Union. I understand steps were being taken to issue agricultural scrip to the States in rebellion, which was unjustifiable and not provided by any law upon the statute-book. Now I yield for a few moments to the gentleman from Tennessee.

The SPEAKER. How many?

Mr. BIDWELL. Ten.

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, I hope the resolution as reported by the committee will be adopted. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] holds that there ought not to be any difference made between Tennessee and the other States that have been in rebellion. I differ with him in that regard; there ought to be a difference made by this House between Tennessee and those other States. As the gentleman from California [Mr. BIDWELL] has very truly remarked, if the other States will adopt the policy that has been pursued by Tennessee since the close of the war, I have no hesitation in saying that this House will accept their State governments and admit their Representatives upon this floor.

Why, sir, the idea of not making a difference between Tennessee and the other States is absurd. When you come to compare the act of the people of the loyal State of Tennessee and the people of the other States, how is it? Before the rebellion closed the loyal people of Tennessee ordered a convention of five hundred and twenty delegates, who assembled, amended their State constitution, submitted it to the loyal people, and on the 22d of February, 1865, the loyal people went to the polls and ratified the constitution. They then elected a loyal Legislature, and that Legislature, by virtue of power delegated to them by our amended constitution, and after having enfranchised the loyal men of the State, has prohibited all disloyal men from voting or holding office. And yesterday the lower branch of that Legislature passed a bill to organize the militia and to organize a regiment of cavalry subject to the order of the Governor in each congressional district. And they have gone further. They have passed a bill striking out the word white and have thus enfranchised every loyal man in the State regardless of color. They have thus placed the government in the hands of loyal men, and by the God that made them they intend to keep it there.

Now, I say let the other States do what Tennessee has done, and I have no doubt that this side of the House will vote to a man to recognize their State governments and admit their Representatives who are loyal.

A MEMBER. And give them the land.

Mr. STOKES. Yes, sir; and give them the land scrip. But I appeal to the House not to trammel this resolution with an amendment including all the other States lately in rebellion. If they have no Representatives here, let them present themselves through the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LE BLOND,] and I have no doubt they will be dealt with fairly. Tennessee came forward with a resolution obeying the orders and wishes of the loyal people of the State. We simply ask the House to extend the time which was granted under the act of 1862. We could not accept the grant of land; we were prohibited from accepting it, and after having done what we have we come forward and ask Congress to grant us time in order that we may accept this liberal grant of land.

Mr. Speaker, we ought not to be trammelled with the proposition to add the ten States. You may remember there was a school fund in the State of Tennessee that did belong to the poor children, but it went with the rebel governor of the State; the poor children were divested of their just rights by the act of the rebels. And now it is proposed to invest the loyal people of Tennessee with this fund, to confide it to them, so as to keep the rebels from running off with it again. Suppose you were to extend it to the ten unreconstructed States, have you any guarantee that they would take care of it and not squander it again? I think this House ought not to trammel this resolution with any amendment of that sort, and I appeal to the House to sustain it as reported from the committee.

Mr. LE BLOND. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I understand him to say that Tennessee has recently amended her constitution so that none but the loyal people of the State are now permitted to participate in the elections. Now, I wish to know from the gentleman, taking into consideration the letter that he wrote some time ago stating that he was for the patriot Davis and against the tyrant Lincoln, on which side he is now left by that constitutional amendment—the side of Davis or the side of the Union. [Laughter.]

Mr. STOKES. The gentleman has alluded to what is called the Duncan letter again. It was alluded to on the last day of the last session. That sir, is the only letter, the only word, of mine that any man can put his finger on where I have deviated from the track. I will state that that letter was written on the 10th day of May, and on the 12th day of May I took the stump in favor of Lincoln and this Government. But not satisfied with even canvassing my district and filling my appointments up to the 8th of June, and voting against secession, I went to Nashville and there entered the Federal Army. I took my position in the Federal Army under the old flag, and I fought out of that Duncan letter as you ought to have done out of your Copperhead connections. [Great applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

The SPEAKER. The House cannot be insulted by the spectators in the galleries. The assistant doorkeepers are instructed to remove from the galleries all persons manifesting either applause or disapprobation.

Mr. LE BLOND. We, upon this side of the House have no rebel letters to explain or defend. [Shouts of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen upon the floor will set a good example to the spectators in the gallery by themselves observing the respect due to the House, and abstaining from demonstrations of applause. The respect due to the House must be observed both by members on the floor and by those in the galleries.

Mr. SPALDING. I object to this discussion as not pertinent to the issue before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order; it is not pertinent to the issue.

Mr. STOKES. The gentleman from Ohio was permitted to draw these remarks from me by his reference to my Duncan letter.

The SPEAKER. That may be, but when the point of order is made the debate must be confined to the bill before the House.

Mr. STOKES. I hope then the House will sustain the joint resolution reported by the Committee on Agriculture. And all I wish to say in conclusion is, that I shall stand upon the same side and be ready to take the saddle again when the time comes, if it ever does, and I am well and hearty and able to do service for three years and three months again in the Federal Army.

Mr. BIDWELL. I will now yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. GRINNELL.]

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GRINNELL. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am entirely ignorant upon this subject or I would not ask for the information that I am about to ask for. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from California what became of the bill which passed the House at the last session providing for the education of children in these southern States, without distinction as to those which had passed ordinances of secession, whether that bill ever passed the Senate or became a law? I refer to the bill introduced by the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DONNELLY.]

Mr. BIDWELL. That was a different bill altogether. It has no relation to and no bearing on this bill that I know of.

Mr. JOHNSON. It strikes me that if it was proper to pass that bill last session providing for the education of children throughout the Union it is proper now that we should put these means of education in the hands of the people of these States.

Mr. BIDWELL. I regret as much as any one can do that any State should be deprived of the benefits of institutions established by the Government for the purpose of extending the privileges of education. But if they are deprived of those benefits who is to blame for it but they who attempted to destroy the best Government on earth?

Mr. JOHNSON. That is entirely irrelevant to the question before the House. The gentleman is speaking about the punishment due to the fathers. My point is this: that if it was proper last summer to pass through this House a bill to provide an educational bureau for the purpose of educating the children of the South and to raise up the coming generation to be what they ought to be, why should we not to-day extend to those children the benefit of this land grant which we have heretofore made?

Mr. BHELLEY, of Ohio. We will do it as soon as they are reorganized.

Mr. BIDWELL. I have only to say that I will go as far as he who goes farthest to extend the benefits of education to the people of the South, for I believe that one of the chief causes of the rebellion was the want of intelligence among the people. And I believe the great preventive will be to extend to them by every practicable mode the means of education. But I do not believe we should begin by these munificent grants of land for the purpose of establishing colleges of agriculture; we ought to begin with the school-book, with a kind of missionary enterprise.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman tell me how it is he makes a distinction between grants of land for this purpose and grants of money as in the proposition of the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DONNELLY.]

Mr. BIDWELL. The difference is very great. Grants of land are not available until they are disposed of, and in order that they may be properly disposed of the person receiving the grant should be loyal to the Government making the grant. The question must be settled whether this donation shall fall into the hands of persons who are truly loyal, and who will make proper use of it and educate their children in such a way that they will be loyal to the Government.

I now yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] for a few minutes.

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, as my name has been referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. JOHNSON,] it is perhaps proper for me to say in reply that the bill to which he alludes as having been passed at the last session was a bill introduced by a member from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] and that bill does not in any sense provide for the education of the children of the South, either white or black. It simply provides for the creation of a Bureau of Education with supervisory powers only; to supervise and superintend the institutions of education which may now exist or hereafter be established in the South as well as the North. I do not understand that it has any connection with or any bearing upon the joint resolution now before the House. That resolution is merely a provision, as I understand it, to extend to the State of Tennessee the benefits of the acts already passed, making grants of land for the establishment of colleges in the several States for instruction in agricultural and mechanical arts and sciences. The bill passed at the last session of Congress made no grant of money or land. It was entirely of a supervisory character, and requires a very small annual appropriation to carry it into effect. That bill is now pending in the Senate, and I trust it will become a law before the close of this session.

As I understand it this bill comes as a largess or grant from the victorious section of the nation to a State of that section which has offended against the laws of the nation. It is given to the State of Tennessee because Tennessee has placed herself in accord with the wishes and desires of the majority of this nation. And I have no doubt that the magnanimity of the dominant party of this country and of the entire people of the North will sanction all such largesses and gifts to all the States of the South which shall, like Tennessee, place themselves in accord with the desire and will of the nation. But for one I will never vote for any such grant of land to any of the pretended State governments now existing in the South, organized as they are without the authority of Congress, and existing in defiance of its will, and which will undoubtedly use the same for the oppression of a large portion of its own population. Whenever the people of any southern State shall come before the people of the North upon a basis of equality and fair play, I do not think they will be met by any niggardly, limited, or ungenerous policy on the part of the representatives of the nation.

Mr. BIDWELL. I now yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. GRINNELL.] After he shall have concluded, I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

Mr. GRINNELL. As a member of the Committee on Agriculture, I desire to say that this is a very distinct and plain proposition. This joint resolution proposes that the loyal State of Tennessee shall have the advantage of the three hundred thousand acres of land granted to it under the law of 1862 for the purpose of establishing an agricultural college. Now, sir, I am utterly opposed to the rider proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LE BLOND,] that the ten still unreconstructed States, without representation here, shall have the advantages accorded to the loyal State of Tennessee.

I am most happy to be in accord with the eloquent gentleman on my right, [Mr. STOKES,] and to mention here, as it seems to be the most opportune occasion, that we will give the benefits of these land acts to Tennessee, because they are about to make education in that State, not select and partial, but universal. They are about enfranchising the black and the white people there, and providing a general system of common-school education; and they wish also to have a local agricultural college. I shall act with the gentleman from Ohio in conferring these benefits upon those ten States when they establish loyal State governments and send here loyal Representatives; not before.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JOHNSON] asks why we should refuse to educate the children in those ten States. Sir, at the last session of Congress we voted money to feed their children, white and black. This illustrates the charity which Congress is willing to extend, and this Congress will be equally ready to grant land or money for education when we can have assurance that the land and money granted will be devoted to universal education, the education of all, whether white or black.

Mr. LE BLOND. I desire to say to my friend that I think he has mistaken the object of this grant for educational purposes. It is a grant for the benefit of the youth of the States and Territories, and not for the benefit of the States or the Territories proper.

Mr. GRINNELL. Mr. Speaker, the answer to that is that it is not the youth themselves who are to assemble in their Legislatures and appropriate the proceeds of the land we may grant; it is the fathers. If this land should be granted to South Carolina for the education of her youth, the fathers in that State—traitors still in spirit, I regret to say—would vote away this land for purposes foreign to those designed by Congress, or would put it forever beyond the reach of the poor and loyal people of those States. I will ask the gentleman whether he would be willing to extend the benefits of education universally to the people of those States that he is now pleading for.

Mr. LE BLOND. Universally?

Mr. GRINNELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. LE BLOND. That means to the negroes?

Mr. GRINNELL. To all.

Mr. LE BLOND. Why, sir, I should leave that question to the States, where it belongs. However they might decide it I should be content.

Mr. GRINNELL. Yes, sir; and the gentleman in leaving it to the States knows that those States would hunt down the black man because he is loyal and poor—would not place the spelling-book in their hands. He knows that those States would establish no institution for the promotion of agriculture in which the laborers who hew down the forests and reap the fields would enjoy any advantages.

Mr. JOHNSON. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRINNELL] whether any condition was imposed upon Pennsylvania or any of the northern States as to the class of persons to be educated under this grant?

Mr. GRINNELL. No, sir; but Pennsylvania was a loyal State; Pennsylvania was not on trial before the country.

Mr. JOHNSON. But my colleague [Mr. STEVENS] says that Pennsylvania must be reconstructed.

Mr. GRINNELL. Pennsylvania had an educational institution, an agricultural college, which will be supported the better, I trust, by reason of this donation. On the other hand, the States that engaged in the rebellion are not asking this act of liberality from Congress. They are not in a condition to receive it. They must first reconstruct themselves on a loyal basis before they can be entitled to any favors at the hands of Congress.

Mr. BIDWELL. I yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I think that the very language of the law to which this resolution refers demands that we should adopt it. I think, too, that the course of things in Tennessee demands it. Congress made provision for the education of the youth of the country by means of agricultural colleges or universities, and in doing so declared that States should be the trustees of the fund. Tennessee is a State with her representatives in this Hall and in the Senate Chamber. More than that, sir, she has shown her fitness as a State to administer a fund of this kind. She has established an educational system which embraces all her people, and I see by the papers of to-day that that is to be the governing law of all her institutions. She is organizing a militia with cavalry regiments for each county, and is enrolling alike the black and the white citizen to serve side by side in the cause of order and law.

Therefore I say there is a trustee that may accept the fund for Tennessee. But I affirm that gentlemen use erroneous terms when they speak of ten other "States." There is no other "State" to which the resolution under consideration will apply. There is no "State" of South Carolina or of Georgia or of Texas. There were State governments there; but they were overthrown. Andrew Johnson—not a very good authority in general, but one that may be accepted on this point—has told the world that the people of what were those "States" have been deprived of all civil government. Since the overthrow of those States took place the law-making power has never reorganized them. The bastard States, as they are called, are but a work of usurpation, and are in the hands of people who have shown themselves, not only once, but a hundred times, unfit to administer a fund for educational purposes. Sir, the statute-books of the country are swollen with grants of land to the old southern States for educational purposes; and I challenge gentlemen to show that any one of the grants was ever faithfully administered and applied within those ten overthrown States.

As much land has been given to the southern States for educational purposes as to those of the North, and yet where are their common schools? They had none, but they had laws prohibiting Christian benevolence from teaching children or adults to read the Lord's Prayer and the Ten Commandments, while they were squandering rich grants of lands made for educational purposes.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. KELLEY. I cannot in a five minutes' speech.

Mr. Speaker, how is it that if such grants were faithfully applied whole regiments of white soldiers in the confederate army, when called upon to sign their names, had to employ other than their own hands, and to attest the signatures by their marks? Why? Because the men who are wielding Andrew Johnson's usurpations had corruptly used for other purposes, private or public, the grants of land for educational, common school, college, and university purposes. The intellectual eyes of the masses of the South were put out; their intellects were benumbed; their passions were excited by the men to whom we are asked now to grant lands for educational purposes. Sir, a man who has proven himself to be a false trustee shall never by my vote be made the custodian of a trust for the people of the South, or any State which may be established there. I shall vote for the resolution making the grant to Tennessee. Her schools, like her militia, are to be open to every child born in the Commonwealth or coming to it as an immigrant. Therefore let us give this land to her; and let us show to the people of the insurrectionary districts that when they too shall have organized republican constitutions such as the Congress of the United States can accept these beneficent grants will be open to them.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BIDWELL. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota, to submit an amendment to the bill.

Mr. DONNELLY. I offer the following amendment:

Provided, The grant of land so made by the act to which this refers and is amendatory shall be held by the State of Tennessee subject to this condition: that no person shall ever be employed as a professor or teacher in the said agricultural college for the State of Tennessee who ever held any military or civil office in the so-called confederate government or in the rebel government of Tennessee.

Mr. BIDWELL. I now call for the previous question.

Mr. CHANLER. I hope the gentleman will not insist on it.

Mr. BIDWELL. I will give the gentleman five minutes after the previous question has been seconded.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California, who reported the bill, is now entitled to one hour in which to close the debate.

Mr. BIDWELL. In reference to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota, I have only to say that I consider the bill all right without it; but there can be no serious objection to it with it. The State of Tennessee is loyal to-day, and I entertain the hope she will ever remain so; but if there be any doubt of it, if there be any fear the State of Tennessee may at some time fall into the hands of those who entertain rebellious sentiments against the Government, then as a safeguard I will not object to the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota. Still, I am not tenacious of the amendment. I will now yield for a short time to the gentleman from Tennessee. I am pressed on all sides to call for a vote.

Mr. HILL. I wish to move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded if it be decided that the result will be now to give the Judiciary Committee three instead of two morning hours.

The SPEAKER. That motion can be made after the hour of the gentleman from California.

Mr. BIDWELL. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee five minutes.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, the original resolution as reported by the committee in my opinion should be adopted. I think it is necessary and right that it should be. By the act of 1862 the donation of land was made to Tennessee, but owing to the rebellion the Legislature of that State did not accept it within the two years provided by the act. By the act of 1866 that limit was extended alone to those States at that time represented upon the floors of Congress. The State of Tennessee was not then represented, and that grant thus made to the State fell through; and now, sir, unless the time be extended to the State to accept it we shall lose the grant. This gives the proper authority, and that is all we ask.

Mr. Speaker, I differ widely with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] in the views he has presented to this House in regard to these questions, but that does not interfere with my voting for a proposition right in itself, and when he charges the President of the United States as a usurper, if it were permitted I would say, as Marmion said to Lord Douglas—

"Lord Angus, thou hast lied."

I believe the resolution to be right, and I ask the House to adopt it.

Mr. BIDWELL. I now yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER.]

Mr. CHANLER. I cannot allow an opportunity so favorable as this for advocating the cause of universal education to pass without saying a word. I must point to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] as the barrier to universal education on this question to-day. I support the resolution, and ask for its extension to the people of this Union without regard to sex, race, or color. I ask it for the benefit which we all know education confers upon the people in every walk of life. But the policy suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania would debar the children of the southern States from the advantages of education, so necessary for the management of their own affairs and for their defense against the force of armed militia under the Republican organization, which is sought to be imposed upon the southern States.

Sir, what is the core, the center, the vital principle of that organization as declared by its journal in this city? It is that none but soldiers are to be elected to office by the suffrages of the grand army of the Republic. It is an easy transition from the militia organization to the ballot-box, and the tenacity and persistency of the gentleman from Pennsylvania in excluding the white race from the advantages of education will, if successful, result in the degradation of the white men in the southern States. If his system has any other object, let him declare it. If the policy of this Government is to extend the benefits of education to all, then in the name of the Constitution, which is based upon the intelligence of the people, do not shut out the ten States or Territories, or whatever you may see fit to call them, from education simply because the people of that section differ from you on political questions. They have been arrayed in battle against you for want perhaps of that superior education which you have received. I ask, is it wise or just to exclude from the advantages of knowledge the children of the soldiers who were in the rebel army? Sir, extend to them kindness and give them the opportunity of acquiring an education that shall fit them for becoming good citizens of the Republic in future.

The gentleman says the trustee has been false to the trust. He looks upon these States as trustees and as having violated their trust, and to maintain his own consistency, with loud-mouthed denunciation of the men who fought, he proposes to exclude the children of those men from the benefits of education. Sir, if the gentleman has seen in the city which he represents here, and of which he is a worthy ornament, the advantage of public education, if he has seen it in other cities, notwithstanding the disturbances which arise from the great diversity of population and the variety of nationalities there, what in the name of sense will be the result throughout the vast region of country lately in rebellion? The light of the truth carried by the printing press throughout that section is by the action of that gentleman and his friends to be excluded from the southern people. Why does he exclude them? That he may maintain a concentrated political organization within this body, where he may speak all he knows, while those he assails are without a Representative on this floor. He would continue the tyrannical supremacy of Congress over a downtrodden, ignorant people, excluded from opportunities of education more dear to the patriot and the Christian than the ballot itself. The very Bible, about which that gentleman prates with such a pretense of philanthropy as being excluded from the black man, he would by his system exclude from the white people of those States. Oh, hypocrisy! thy name is politics; and when thou arrayest thyself in human form thou speakest in the loud-mouthed words of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman from California yield to me a moment?

Mr. BIDWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to catch the ear of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] a moment. I did not, in the confusion around me, hear his language exactly. I want to ask him whether those around me are right in saying that he impugned my veracity.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I said that when the gentleman from Pennsylvania charged Andrew Johnson with being a usurper, if I were permitted to quote the language of Marmion to Lord Douglas I would say—

"Lord Angus, thou hast lied."

Mr. KELLEY. If I were permitted! Sir, while the usurpation was plotting he was the confidential paid agent of the usurper, and knew all the secrets of the usurpation, and if conscience has not been extinguished in him he is not permitted to deny my allegation.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is mistaken as to his facts. While I was the confidential agent and friend of the President of the United States, and I glory in the fact, not one dollar of his money has ever been handled by me; and when the gentleman says that I was his paid agent he lies again.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. KELLEY. It was not Andrew Johnson's own money he handled; it was ours and that of the people of the United States. The gentleman from Tennessee was a member of the President's household, and was paid for his services. I will not bandy blackguardism with him on this floor.

Mr. JENCKES. I call these gentlemen to order. I submit that these remarks do not apply to the bill now before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BIDWELL. I will now yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DONNELLY.]

Mr. DONNELLY. I have offered an amendment to the joint resolution, which has been read at the Clerk's desk. I did not offer it without having first submitted it to the consideration and approval of some of the Representatives from Tennessee upon this floor.

The resolution under consideration will give the State of Tennessee three hundred thousand acres of the Government lands. These will not be to any extent lands located within the State of Tennessee, but they will be taken from the great West. It is a grant, therefore, given by the nation to the State of Tennessee. It will create a college there, a great institution of learning erected by the beneficence of the nation. It is just and right that that institution so existing by virtue of a grant made by the nation shall not foster or encourage the enemies of the nation. I have, therefore, offered this amendment that no man who has been an officer, civil or military, under the so-called confederate government or under the rebel government of Tennessee shall hold office in the college as professor or tutor.

I urge this in no spirit of persecution, but it is just and right if we by our grant create an institution that our very grant shall not be turned into a means whereby the enemies of the country may teach their damnable heresies to the rising generation.

We have already seen that in the State of Virginia the great military chieftain of the rebellion (General Lee) has been appointed a professor in one of its colleges; and it is within the probabilities that the time may come in the State of Tennessee when the author of the Fort Pillow massacre might preside over the college created under the very grant we are now engaged in making. I therefore trust that the amendment I have offered may be added to the bill, so that if we make this grant and create this institution rebels shall not be its professors.

Mr. LE BLOND. I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota whether his amendment would not be an attempt on the part of Congress to regulate the management of the affairs of a college which is under State jurisdiction, and whether that would not be a usurpation on the part of Congress of a power that does not belong to the General Government.

Mr. DONNELLY. I would say, in answer to the gentleman, that if we make a grant we have full power to affix the conditions upon which it shall be held. If the conditions do not suit the State she may refuse the grant. I would call the attention of the House to the fact that the State of Maryland has but the other day, almost within sight of this Capitol, appointed a son of General Lee as one of the principal professors in one of its agricultural colleges; and we will be false to our duty as Representatives of the loyal people of the United States if we do not prevent such a contingency in the State of Tennessee.

Mr. BIDWELL. I now call for the vote.

Mr. ROGERS. I desire to move an amendment to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done, as the previous question is operating.

Mr. ROGERS. Then by what right does the gentleman from Minnesota offer his amendment?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from New Jersey had been observant of the proceedings of the House he would have known that the amendment was offered some time since, and before the previous question was seconded.

Mr. LE BLOND. Upon the adoption of the amendment I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 114, nays 35, not voting 42; as follows:

Mr. BIDWELL. I call the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. BIDWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed an act (S. No. 525) supplementary to an act to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes, approved July 18, 1866; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

SMALL-ARMS.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution, upon which he called the previous question:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House five hundred extra copies of the communication from the Secretary of War in answer to a resolution of this House in reference to small-arms.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. LAFLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SOLDIERS OF WAR OF 1812.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution, upon which he called the previous question:

Resolved, That five thousand extra copies of the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions on the bills granting pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812 be printed for the use of the House.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. LAFLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAYMENT OF PENSIONS.

Mr. PERHAM. I ask unanimous consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table the amendments of the Senate to the amendments of the House to Senate bill No. 69, to provide for the payment of pensions.

No objection was made.

Mr. PERHAM. I move that the amendments of the Senate be non-concurred in, and that a committee of conference be requested upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PERHAM moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. STEVENS. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of House bill No. 543, for restoring to the States lately in insurrection their full political rights. Upon this bill, by unanimous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] was to be regarded as entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not propose at present to call the previous question, but will leave the bill open for discussion to-day. I now yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND.]

Mr. RAYMOND. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] has decided to leave this great and engrossing subject open for still further discussion, I will take advantage of his consent to present as briefly as possible some considerations upon the subject which I would be glad to bring to the attention of the House. And as I do not desire to trespass unduly upon the patience of the House, I shall feel under obligations to the Speaker if he will protect me from interruption, if there should be any disposition on the part of gentlemen to reply during the progress of my remarks to anything I may say. And as I do not desire to follow the example of the attorney who persisted in arguing his case after the jury had brought in a verdict, I will take occasion to say that in my judgment some aspects of this great question of reconstruction have been virtually settled, so far at least as to remove them from the arena of profitable discussion at this time. By various expressions of public sentiment, through the press, through this body, in legislative assemblies all over the land, and especially through the verdict rendered last fall at the polls, I think I am quite justified in saying that the people have themselves already decided several points of this great controversy. One of the points embraced in that decision I think is this: that they are not willing to accept as a basis of adjustment and restoration what has been put forward as the policy of the President of the United States. In other words, they are not willing that the States lately in insurrection shall resume their former portion of political power as members of this Union, and to give admission to their representatives in the two Houses of Congress without some provision for the future or without specific authority of law. The President had put this forward as his view of what was just and proper to be done in this case, providing only that the representatives they might send should be loyal men. I concurred in that opinion; and I say frankly that I am still of the opinion that if this had been done at an early stage of the controversy, promptly, cheerfully, generously by the party which ruled the destinies of this country at that time, it would have restored peace and healed to a great extent all the troubles of the body-politic. But because I believed and still believe that to have been the best policy then, I do not feel bound to maintain that it is the best policy now. A physician may prescribe a gargle for a sore throat; and if his prescription is thrown out of the window the sore throat may develop into an inflammation or into a raging and consuming fever; but he would be regarded as wanting in sound judgment and in common sense if for the sake of consistency he should feel bound to prescribe nothing but gargles during the whole progress of the disease. I shall therefore dismiss from consideration as impracticable and out of the question this mode of settling the controversy which divides and distracts the nation. And in the next place, although they have not pronounced decisively upon any specific plan of adjustment, I think the people have decided more nearly than they have decided upon anything else that the constitutional amendment adopted by Congress at its last session and submitted to the several States for ratification affords, on the whole, the wisest and the most satisfactory basis of adjustment of which this question in its present attitude is susceptible. And finally, I think the people have decided that they would rather trust to Congress to devise some mode of settling this question, some mode of restoring those States which were lately in rebellion to the Union, than trust to the executive department of the Government. They regard it as a matter for the legislative power rather than for the President alone.

But in saying this I do not mean to imply that they have committed themselves in advance to anything and everything which Congress may see fit to do. While they have expressed a general preference for the constitutional amendment, and a general confidence in Congress rather than the Executive, I think they have trusted not so much to any particular plan of adjustment as to the presumed wisdom and patriotism and justice and good sense which the men whom they have deputed to act here as their Representatives will bring to the consideration and settlement of the question. They will therefore require that whatever we may do here shall be characterized by wisdom, by patriotism, and by that practical good sense which should mark everything we attempt for the public good; and if we are to throw aside the amendment as a basis of adjustment, as the very men who proposed and pressed it seem disposed now to do, they will require at our hands something much wiser, more effectual, and more practical in its place. The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] has submitted a bill by which he proposes to settle the question now at issue before the country. That bill is before us for consideration, and it contains three leading cardinal principles. The first is that the States—I speak of the bill as it stands now after modification and amendment—that the State governments now existing in the South, in those States which had been previously in rebellion, are to be deprived of all legal authority; their acts are to be pronounced null and void; and it is proposed that in place of the governments which exist in those States to-day we shall, suspending the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, extend martial law over all that territory.

In the next place the bill proposes that this Congress shall authorize the election of delegates to conventions in each of those States, first prescribing universal suffrage as the basis on which they shall be elected; that those conventions shall form constitutions, Congress prescribing certain principles and provisions which shall be incorporated into any constitution which those conventions may frame; these constitutions thus formed shall then be submitted to the people of those States for ratification, and if ratified, to be then brought here and submitted to the approval of Congress, which they must receive before the governments thus formed are to have validity and practical authority to enact laws for the government of those States. And in the third place, the bill provides that if the Legislatures of those States, after their constitutions shall have been thus formed, adopted, and approved, shall at any time disregard, abrogate, or annul any of the principles which the bill prescribes for adoption in those constitutions, then the State so acting shall forfeit its representation in Congress.

There is pending here, a substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] to the bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr.

STEVENS,] which differs from it in only one respect; I mean in matter of general principle. That substitute declares that all the acts and laws of the existing State governments shall be null and void; but it provides for them no substitute whatever during the interim which must elapse before the provisions of the law we propose to enact for the formation of new governments shall have been carried into effect.

Now, sir, I take it we have to inquire, while we are examining the provisions of this bill, first, whether we have the power to pass it, and whether, if so, it is wise that we should pass it. What are these governments now existing in the southern States which we propose thus to supersede? They are governments having actual force and effect within the territory subject to their jurisdiction. They are de facto governments. They originated, as all gentlemen here know, by the act of the people of those States, under the lead and guidance, and, if you chose to say so, under the authority and direction of the President of the United States. It is proposed to annul these governments, partly because of their origin, because they did thus originate in the acts of the Executive, and partly because the governments thus established do not protect the rights, liberties, and property of their citizens as we think they ought to do.

Now, sir, I shall not enter upon the question whether the President had power to do what he did in inducing the southern States to form these governments, for the question has already been fully discussed. I discussed it myself at the last session and I do not wish to reopen it now. I thought then, and still believe, that the President did not transcend the authority with which he is clothed, in setting in motion the machinery of government in those States and in authorizing their people to enact laws for their own protection. I have no doubt that if Congress had been in session when the contingency arose it would have had equal authority in the premises, and that it might have authorized the people of those States to take steps for the reorganization of their governments. But as it was not in session, and as the necessity for government was pressing, the President deemed it within his legitimate authority to take such steps as the emergency required. He did not prescribe arbitrarily, it must be remembered, qualifications of suffrage in the formation of new governments; he merely fell back upon the laws in force on that subject, and recognized by the State government and by the national Government alike, before the rebellion began. And if it be urged that he prescribed conditions—that he required them to ratify the amendment abolishing slavery, to repudiate the rebel debt, and to nullify their ordinances of secession before he would recognize the governments thus established—it is fair also to remember that no one complains of these requirements; that the people themselves do not complain, and that those here who do object to his making those requirements concede that in themselves they were perfectly just and right.

They object only to the President's authority to make them. But if the requirements themselves were just, and if the people upon whom they were made do not object, certainly we may cure any defect on the score of origin by declaring them valid, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] in the bill as reported proposed to do. We may have the power, strictly speaking we may possibly have the right, to abolish and destroy them. But I certainly do not deem it wise so to do solely on account of their origin, solely on account of an alleged lack of power on the part of the President to authorize the people to form and establish them. It is usual all over the world to recognize de facto governments and respect their authority without inquiring too closely into the rigid legality of their origin. And we should, in my judgment, adopt and act upon this rule, unless there is something in their character to forbid it. How is it here? Is it wise, would it under existing circumstances be conducive to the public peace and the public welfare to sweep away these local governments which have now for nearly two years been discharging, more or less perfectly, the functions of government for the people of these southern States? I take it for granted that every one who hears me will concede that it is an absolute necessity that every community should have at all times an organized government of some kind for the enactment and enforcement of law. Any government is always better than no government. Despotism is always better than anarchy. The government of the King of Dahomey is better for the people of Dahomey than no government, no authority, no control whatever would be. Now, the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] proposes to abolish all the governments in these southern States, to declare all the laws they have enacted to be absolutely null and void, and to leave them for a certain time absolutely without government or law of any kind.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. The gentleman is mistaken.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. RAYMOND. Certainly, for correction if I have made an erroneous statement.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. It is first to be in a provisional condition, and then the provisional government elected by the constitutional convention are to administer the State government until a constitutional government is recognized by Congress.

Mr. RAYMOND. If I understand it, the first section of the bill annuls absolutely all those governments now existing, and declares all the laws which they have enacted to be absolutely null and void. This takes effect as soon as the bill becomes a law, and subsequent sections provide that the conventions to be elected under this law may appoint provisional governors and commissioners, who shall administer the government until the constitution, to be framed, adopted, and ratified by Congress, shall take effect. But between the date of the passage of this act and the action of the conventions to be elected under it, the governments now existing are abolished and their laws nullified, and no provision whatever is made for any authority in their place. There is to be an interregnum extending from the date of this act to the appointment of provisional governors by the convention to be elected under it, and for that time the bill of the gentleman from Ohio makes absolutely no provision whatever.

But, as I was saying, it is an absolute necessity that every community should have at all times some government, some law, whatever its origin and whatever its character. The governments now existing in the South are in the actual daily discharge of governmental functions. They are making laws for the government and control of their people. They are providing for the punishment of crime, for the enforcement of contracts, for the transfer of property, for the regulation of civil relations, for the thousand transactions of common life. It is urged that these laws are not equal; that they are unjust, inadequate to the protection of the lives, liberties, and property of their people; that those of their people who have been true to the nation during the recent war, and especially those of the negro race, are not protected in their rights.

I admit there is ground for this complaint. I believe it to be true that crimes are of daily occurrence in many sections of the southern States which are shocking to humanity, and which call loudly for redress. And it is greatly to the discredit of these governments, it is well calculated to arouse against them the hostility of men who love justice and equal rights everywhere, that they tolerate such outrages and crimes within the territory subject to their jurisdiction. It is proposed by this bill that we shall suspend the habeas corpus and substitute martial law over all this territory instead of the State governments; in other words, that the authority and direct power of the nation shall take the place of the governments which now exist in the South. I submit, in the first place, that this act will not remedy the evil; it will not give the security required, even if it should become a law. It must be remembered that the Federal Government already has full authority to interpose its power for the protection of the people whose lives and liberty are in jeopardy in all the region embraced in the rebellion. The Freedmen's Bureau bill and the civil rights bill passed at the last session, and which are now in force as laws, both authorize the direct interference of the Government of the United States for the protection of the civil rights of the people of all that territory against or in default of the local authorities and without distinction of race or color.

But it is said these laws are not sufficient because they depend for their execution upon the President of the United States, and he is opposed to the principle of those laws, and therefore is lax in their execution. Now without raising any question as to the matter of fact, I submit that martial law, if declared, is subject to exactly the same contingency. The President of the United States is Commander-in-Chief of the Army; if martial law should be declared, its execution devolves upon him, and if he will not execute these, what right have we to assume or presume that he will execute that? I do not see, therefore, that we should gain any additional security for those great interests which justly deserve our care by the enactment of martial law.

So much, sir, for the practical operation of this section of the bill if it should become a law. But behind all this arises in my mind this objection: that we have not the power under existing circumstances to declare martial law over that territory. The Constitution in the ninth section of the first article declares that—

"The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it."

The privilege of habeas corpus is not suspended in that section now. It is enjoyed by all the people of that territory. It was suspended during the war, but it has since been restored by direct proclamation of the Executive, authorized by law. If it is to be suspended now, therefore, it must be by an original exercise of power on our part, and if we are to be governed by the Constitution we must confine ourselves to the specific contingencies which alone, according to the Constitution of the United States allow its suspension. Those contingencies are, first, that there shall exist a case either of rebellion or invasion, and secondly, that in consequence of that rebellion or invasion the public safety shall require its suspension.

Now, there certainly is no invasion in those States, and I think there is no rebellion there, though upon that point different opinions are held, some maintaining that constructively at least and in contemplation of law the state of rebellion still exists. I will not stop to argue that point; but certainly there is no such rebellion existing there at the present moment as endangers the public safety, for that means something more than the safety and rights of individual members of the community; it means the public safety—the safety of the nation, of the whole public, or body politic and corporate. That certainly is not endangered. That certainly does not require that the privilege of this writ should be suspended. I do not see, therefore, how, if this provision of the Constitution is to control our action here, we can possibly find authority to suspend this writ and declare martial law over that territory, as this bill proposes to do. I think I run no risk in saying that it is absolutely certain that any such law enacted by us would be declared null and void by the Supreme Court of the United States upon the first case arising under it that should come before that tribunal.

I have thus examined the first provision of the bill as it now stands. As originally introduced by the honorable member from Pennsylvania, it proposed to give validity to the existing governments, to sanction their laws, until they should be replaced by other governments, to be formed under our authority. That provision was, in my judgment, just and wise, far better adapted to the necessities of the case than the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] which he accepted, which encounters, as I have endeavored to show, not only serious objections on the score of policy, but the direct and explicit prohibitions of the Constitution.

The bill provides in the next place for the organization of new governments in those States under authority of Congress. It prescribes the qualifications of suffrage in the election of delegates, and dictates certain provisions of law which must be embodied in the constitutions they may form before they can even be submitted to Congress for ratification. The learned member from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] in his very able argument submitted to the House a few days since, objected to this as a substantial denial of the right of petition to the people of those States—a right which belongs to every citizen within the limits or jurisdiction of the United States. If they are States within the Union, I think it also in direct conflict with the second section of the first article of the Constitution, which expressly gives to the States absolute and exclusive power to fix the qualifications of suffrage within their limits.

Whether they are States within the Union or not is a point I shall not argue now. I have given on previous occasions my reasons for believing that they are. But if they are, they can only be so under and by virtue of the Constitution, and I confess my inability to see why, in that case, they do not come under all the provisions of that instrument. Either they are States of the Union, thus clothed with such functions and duties as the Constitution confers upon States of the Union, or they are not States at all, but conquered provinces, subject solely and absolutely to the will of the national authority. One or the other of these positions must be true. I cannot, with all my disposition so to do, perceive the force of the argument by which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] sought to show that they are still States for some purposes but not for others, that they are States for Federal purposes but not for purposes of local government, that they may ratify amendments to the national Constitution, but cannot make laws for their own government. I cannot perceive any basis for such a distinction either in the language or the spirit of the Constitution. This bill treats them as conquered provinces. If they are, we have the right to deal with them as this bill proposes to do. But I have heretofore discussed this point so much at length that I will not again enter upon it at the present time. I have only to say that I have seen no reason to change my original opinion, nothing in any quarter to refute the doctrine laid down by a very learned and distinguished judge of the State of Massachusetts in the decision of a case that came before him: that the war for the suppression of the rebellion could not give the Government the rights of conquest, nor could it authorize us to divest a State of all political privileges and treat it as foreign territory acquired by arms.

The same considerations apply with still greater force to the third of the provisions of this bill, which provides that if at any time after readmission any of these States shall abrogate, alter, or change any of the provisions which this bill requires them to ingraft upon their constitutions, that State shall thereby and thereupon forfeit its right to representation in Congress. After admission they become States of the Union, and will be, beyond all doubt, upon a footing of perfect equality with all the other States. The national Government cannot have power, in my judgment, thus to inflict upon them terms and penalties which it cannot also inflict upon any and all of the other States of the Union. And with this statement of my views upon that point, as my time is too limited for any argument of the question, I leave it.

For these reasons, sir, reasons of policy and of authority, I do not think we ought to pass this bill. I do not believe it would be at all effective in securing the objects at which we aim, or that it would conduce in the slightest degree to promote peace and secure equal rights among the people upon whom it is to take effect. And I cannot help believing that it contains provisions directly at war with specific and peremptory prohibitions of the Constitution. So much for that.

But, sir, there is a graver aspect to this question. I have proceeded thus far upon the assumption that in this whole matter of restoring the States lately in rebellion, as in the war against them, the Constitution is the supreme law. But the opinion is held by some—and acted upon, I venture to believe, by many who do not avow it, and who perhaps are not quite conscious that they are acting upon it—that the restrictions and prohibitions of the Constitution have no application to such a case as this. A learned and distinguished jurist of my own State, a gentleman who has filled the highest judicial offices in that State, as well as represented this Government at a foreign Court—I refer to Judge Conkling—has recently declared that this is no constitutional question at all; that it arises outside the Constitution, and that, to use his own language, we might as well refer to the Koran as the Constitution for the purpose of getting light upon it.

On the other hand, the Supreme Court of the United States, in a decision recently pronounced, has declared that the Constitution as interpreted by that court is and must be the supreme law alike for rulers and people under all circumstances and at all times, in peace and in war, and that none of its provisions can ever at any time be abrogated, transcended, or suspended during any of the great emergencies of Government. Now, sir, while I cannot assent to the doctrine of the distinguished judge whom I first quoted, while I think it incumbent upon us as individual citizens and as members of the Government to regard and respect the Constitution as the absolute rule of our action, I think that the opinion of the Supreme Court is liable to a construction somewhat stronger and more sweeping than the real facts of the case warrant. It seems to assert that the ultimate sovereignty of the nation rests in the Constitution; that there is nothing behind it; that it binds the people in their national and political character as well as in their relations as individual citizens, absolutely and at all times; and that no emergency of Government can permit or sanction any departure from its provisions or the exercise of any authority which it does not confer.

Now, for all practical purposes in the ordinary movements and operations of government this is well enough. It is well that high regard and reverence for the Constitution should thus be inculcated, and that all the action of all classes, of rulers and people, should proceed upon that basis. But as an absolute statement of the nature and residence of national sovereignty I cannot accept it. It seems to assert that the ultimate sovereignty of the nation rests in the Constitution; that there is nothing higher, nothing superior to it in authority. But there must be some power somewhere which gives that Constitution its authority. It certainly is not self-derived. We are bound to obey its injunctions, not simply because they are there, but because they come to us, through it, from some power which has the right to prescribe them; and that power, whatever it is and wherever it resides, must of necessity be higher than the Constitution itself.

Nor can it be maintained that all the authority of the Constitution was conferred, once for all, by the Convention which originally framed and the people who originally adopted it, and that it now simply represents their will and their authority. Sovereignty is something which abides with and is inseparable from that power in which it exists. It cannot die nor can it be suspended. It is ever-living and ever-present, giving at all times the sanction of its authority to the organs and instruments of its will. The nation itself is that supreme, sovereign power in this country; not the nation as it existed in 1789, but the nation as it exists to-day. The Constitution exists for the nation, not the nation for the Constitution. It is the nation which gives authority to the Constitution, not the Constitution which gives authority to the nation. The nation is sovereign; the Government is the organ of such portion of its sovereignty as it sees fit to delegate; and the Constitution is the rule of conduct prescribed to the Government by the nation, and by which that authority is to be exercised. Of course, neither the Government nor the rule of its action can be superior in authority to the nation which prescribes them both. It is the nation, therefore, which is sovereign, and the people, either as a political unit or as existing under State organizations—I will not now inquire which—are the nation.

We may, I think, suppose a case in which the doctrine of the Supreme Court just cited, that neither rulers nor the people—meaning thereby the nation—can under any circumstances or in any emergencies exercise any power not conferred by the Constitution, would not be true. It was the nation which waged the war against the rebellion. Now, suppose that in the midst of the war the Supreme Court had decided that the war was unconstitutional, would the war have stopped? Would the people have abandoned the attempt to vindicate their sovereignty and to preserve their existence as a nation? Ought they to have done so? They might have chosen to do so; in the exercise of their sovereignty they might have had the right to surrender their national character and take instead of it the character of a league of sovereign, independent States; but they would also have had the right, in the exercise of the same sovereignty, to defend and maintain their existence as a nation by war.

Nor is it clear that political departments of the Government would have been overborne and bound by such a decision, for it is the general rule in all constitutional governments that the judicial department follows the political instead of leading or overruling it. This, moreover, is to be noted: the decisions of courts can only take place after the facts have occurred, after results have been attained. They cannot annul those results. The Supreme Court may condemn as unconstitutional the war which saved and established our existence as a nation, but it cannot reverse or annul that result. It may decide, as it is now deciding, that steps which the Government, acting as the organ and instrument of the national sovereignty, deemed essential to the success of the war, transcended the authority conferred upon it; but the steps were taken and cannot be taken back. Milligan was arrested, tried by military commission, and convicted of being engaged in a conspiracy to aid the rebellion. The Supreme Court now decides that this trial and conviction were illegal, but they took place nevertheless, and the conspiracy was thus arrested and the rebellion deprived of its aid.

Suppose that the court should now make a similar decision in regard to every measure taken by the Government to suppress the rebellion. Suppose it should decide that the proclamation first calling for troops, the successive drafts, the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, were all unconstitutional. They have nevertheless done their work. They made the war successful, and that result cannot be changed, even if every single step by which it was reached should be pronounced in violation of the fundamental law. I have always believed, and do still believe, that the Government had the authority of the Constitution, express or implied, for all it did in waging war against the rebellion. But if the Supreme Court should decide otherwise, if it should hold that every act done to crush the rebellion was in direct violation of the Constitution, the fact still remains that the rebellion was crushed; and no decisions, no judgments, no processes can revive and reinstate it in what the court may deem its violated constitutional rights. Without going further into what may be deemed too abstract a discussion for such an occasion, what I have said may show that emergencies may arise in which the rule laid down by the Supreme Court is not absolutely true, in which the sovereignty of the nation may transcend the authority of the Constitution without violating the law of the national life, in which, indeed, that law itself may demand such an appeal from the Constitution to the nation which created and maintains it.

Such action, I grant, is extraordinary, revolutionary, indeed, in a certain sense, and only to be vindicated by extraordinary emergencies. Yet it has been resorted to in more than one instance in our brief history already.

When the apprehensions of the first Napoleon that Louisiana would fall into the hands of England led him to instruct his minister here to sell it to the United States, it was the belief of all the leading statesmen of the day that the Constitution gave our Government no power thus to acquire foreign territory. And Jefferson, who was then President, did not hesitate to express the opinion that, without an amendment of the Constitution, we had no right to make the purchase. But there was no time to act upon amendments, and so pressing did he deem the necessity of the case that Jefferson himself made the purchase, and without hesitation gave effect to every step necessary to complete what he had pronounced an unconstitutional transaction. By common consent the act received the nation's sanction, and a construction was thus given to the Constitution which has never since been questioned. Suppose the Supreme Court had decided that purchase unconstitutional, would Louisiana have been given up? The Supreme Court declared the bill chartering a bank of the United States to be constitutional; but President Jackson, claiming the right to administer the Constitution as he understood it, overruled the Supreme Court and vetoed the bill as in violation of the fundamental law; and the nation sustained him in so doing. When President Tyler sent troops across the Rio Grande, and thus involved the United States in war with Mexico without the assent or action of Congress, so great an authority as Chancellor Kent declared that he had committed an unconstitutional act for which he deserved impeachment. Suppose the Supreme Court had decided that the war, because of its origin, was unconstitutional, would Texas and California and New Mexico, the fruits of the war, have been surrendered?

In all these cases the Supreme Court accepted the facts of history, the acts of the Government which had passed into and become parts of the national history, as the settled law, and the people sanctioned them as an exercise of the sovereignty of the nation, transcending the delegated authority of the Constitution, it is true, but justified by the emergency and sanctioned by the result. If the Supreme Court is wise now, it will thus accept as accomplished and irreversible facts not to be drawn in question the processes and results of our recent war.

The instances I have cited show that there is not only in theory but in actual practice a sovereignty higher than that of the written Constitution, and that whenever the emergency requires it that sovereignty will assert itself. Indeed, some of the ablest writers on constitutional law maintain that the real constitution of a nation is something wholly distinct from its written constitution; that it is nothing else than the judgment, the opinion, the will of the nation itself, and that the written constitution is simply an attempt to reduce this will, which is the real constitution, to a fixed and definite form for purposes of law and government. It is important, therefore, that the written constitution should be at all times as nearly as possible the embodiment and expression of the national sentiment, the national will, and this principle is recognized by our Constitution in the provisions made for its own amendment. That written constitution in any country is the best which gives fullest and freest scope to the normal and regular development of the national will and character. "The general opinion of the governed," says Burke, "is the vehicle and organ of legislative omnipotence." In any country where there is life and activity, in this country distinguished above all others for the energy, variety, and incessant activity of its development, there must and will be constant changes in the temper, the necessities, the aspirations of the national mind; and those changes must enter into the structure of the Government, if that Government is to be the organ and instrument of the real sovereignty of the nation.

Any constitution that does not yield readily and easily to the development of the national life lacks an essential element of stability. It must aid, not retard national growth. It must not be unyielding; inflexible—rigidly imposing the restrictions of one era upon the movements, influences, and aspirations of another—or it will be overridden and broken by the growth which it seeks to confine. It is idle, and is every day becoming more and more idle, to rely implicitly upon the early fathers and founders of this nation as decisive authorities on the provisions to be embodied in our fundamental law. Not that we are wiser in the general principles of government and law than they were, but because we know by actual experience what they could not foresee, namely, the temper, the movements, experiences, perils and necessities of the times in which we live and for which we have to act. If we had lived in their day we might not have performed their duties and met their responsibilities as well as they did. If they were living now they might be wiser, more patriotic, less under the sway of passion and prejudice, and better able to do our work than we are. But all this is wide of the mark. They lived and labored in their day, and we live and must labor in ours.

The years that intervene between 1789 and 1867 measure very inadequately the distance between the political and social necessities of that day and this. And while I have been and still am opposed to rash, hasty, and immature attempts to amend the Constitution, while we should be on our guard against a temptation which will always beset us, namely, to ingraft the prejudices, impulses, and even the resentments of the hour upon the fundamental law, it is impossible to doubt that such changes as must always be wrought in the necessities, the convictions, the tone, and the will of the nation by great convulsions, and such as have, beyond all question, been wrought by our recent civil war, must make their mark upon the Constitution, and work corresponding changes in the scope and distribution of the political power which it confers. And history shows that if this is not done by amending the Constitution in accordance with its own provisions, it will be done by an irregular action of the national will, by action not contemplated by the rule prescribed for the conduct of the Government, and therefore revolutionary in its nature, but not the less certain to occur or less effective in its results on that account.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from New York allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RAYMOND. I prefer not to yield now for any question. If I stop for that purpose my whole time may be consumed. When I shall have finished, I will, if it be the pleasure of the House, submit most cheerfully to any cross-examination to which any member may desire to subject me.

Now, sir, the provisions for amendment in our Constitution are very rigid; and it has been made a question by many writers on constitutional law whether they are not too rigid, for a nation so constant and so rapid in its growth as ours, and whether on that account the Constitution is not the more liable to be overridden and its authority transcended with the assent of the nation itself.

Why, sir, bear in mind that of the thirty-six States constituting this Union ten States may defeat any amendment that may be proposed. Now, you can find ten States that together have less than two million people, and in every one of those ten States an amendment proposed by Congress may be voted down by a popular majority of less than a thousand, while in the other twenty-six States the vote may be unanimous in favor of the same amendment. It is not likely that this will occur, but it is among the possibilities of the case; so that less than two million people—nay, less than ten thousand people—in ten States may defeat an amendment demanded by the thirty millions of the remaining States. If we hold with many that the loyal States alone may amend the Constitution, we can find seven States out of the twenty-six, with less than a million of population, who can absolutely defeat any amendment that may be proposed and advocated by the other twenty-five millions.

Considering these possibilities; considering the extreme difficulty at all times of obtaining the assent of three fourths of all the States to amendments concerning which public sentiment is greatly divided, I think there is force in the objection that the provisions of our Constitution for its own amendment are somewhat too rigid. The real Constitution, the governing sentiment of the country, has not full and fair play.

But without dwelling longer upon these abstract points, I proceed to say that the war has developed certain principles and sentiments in the national mind which ought to find a place in the structure and Constitution of the Government. I believe the nation demands that they shall in some way be made the basis upon which the Union is to be fully restored and the practical operations of the Government resumed. The settled sentiment of the nation, in my judgment, demands guarantees against future attempts at secession, guarantees against an inequality of rights and franchises based upon arbitrary distinctions of race or color, guarantees for the inviolability of the national debt and the sanctity of the public credit. I have no doubt at all that the will and purpose of this nation to-day is, and has been ever since the war closed, that there shall be in the Constitution some provision more effective than any yet existing for an equality of rights of all men in this country, and for their protection in the enjoyment of them; for an absolute and immediate equality of civil rights, and for an equality of political rights just as soon as the other and more pressing necessities of the nation will permit.

I think there should be embodied in the Constitution a provision for the absolute equality in civil rights of all the inhabitants of the land; and I believe that there will be soon, if there is not now, from the people, not of one section, not of one class of States, but of all sections and of all States, an equally strong and equally resistless demand for a corresponding equality of political rights.

I think in the next place that the nation as a nation demands an absolute guarantee against future attempts at secession. The people intend that this effort at secession and revolution shall not be repeated. They do not intend to go through again what they have already gone through; nor do they intend that the suffering and the sacrifices they have already experienced shall be without their due effect upon the fundamental law of the nation.

It is not a passing caprice, but the settled judgment of the nation, that these guarantees are essential to the development of the national power and the protection of the public liberties. It is a condition which is much more likely to grow stronger than to grow weaker, for it is founded in justice and consults the public good. If these guarantees were once imbedded in the written Constitution, as the principles and sentiments which demand them are already imbedded in the unwritten but real Constitution of the nation, and the Government were then restored to full, regular activity in all its functions, we should have the highest promise of rapid and peaceful national growth and prosperity for at least another generation, which, as Jefferson held, was quite as long as any Constitution ought to last without revision.

Now, sir, let us see what provision we have attempted to make for meeting this strong and just demand of the national will. We have first the constitutional amendment adopted by Congress at its last session and submitted to the States for their ratification. And now we have this bill intended to supply what that amendment lacked.

Now, the constitutional amendment meets the demand of which I have spoken partially, but only to a certain extent. It does provide for an equality of civil rights. It holds out an inducement to the people of the southern States for the extension of political rights and the elective franchise to the colored race, by increasing their representative power in the national councils in proportion as they shall thus extend the suffrage. Whether this goes far enough or not is a disputed question. Congress at the last session thought it was as far as we could wisely and safely go at present, and I think the people concur in that opinion. And the amendment guarantees the sacredness of the public debt, and clothes Congress with such an enlargement of power as these new provisions may require.

All these provisions are just and wise, and thoroughly in harmony with the sentiment of the nation. But these are all which the amendment contains which are in the nature of a guarantee at all. There is a partial and temporary diminution of political power imposed upon the South, which is just and right, but wholly ineffective as a guarantee; and disabilities are imposed upon classes of the southern people somewhat more sweeping than the public safety requires, and calculated to do more harm by exasperating the South than it does good by securing the peace and security of the nation. The amendment should be maintained, though I believe slight changes might be made in the section to which I have thus referred, which, without in the least degree impairing its value to the nation, would insure its ultimate acceptance by the southern States and thus render it of practical value in the restoration of the Union.

But on the subject of future attempts at secession the proposed amendment contains nothing which can, except by the remotest inference, be construed into a guarantee. The learned and ingenious member from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] contends, I am aware, that such a guarantee is wrapped up in the first section of the amendment, that which relates to an equality of civil rights. But I confess my inability to perceive it very clearly, and I am quite sure the public sentiment would be better satisfied with one more distinct and explicit in its terms. There is a difference of opinion as to whether the States did, under the Constitution as it now stands, by their attempted secession, actually forfeit their representation in Congress and their right to a share in the political power of the nation.

But there is no difference whatever in the opinion that, however this may have been in the past, it shall not be left open to doubt in the future. I believe every State of the Union—those which were loyal and those which were not—will now agree upon an amendment to the Constitution providing that whenever hereafter any State shall attempt to secede, or shall enter into any compact or agreement with any other State to secede from the Union, and shall sustain such attempt or agreement by force of arms, that State shall thereby and thenceforth forfeit all right to participate in the national Government by being represented in Congress or in the Electoral College until readmitted thereto by law. Such a provision, imbedded in the fundamental law, ingrafted upon the Constitution, would leave no shadow of doubt upon this subject hereafter, and would stand as a perpetual guarantee against secession through all time to come.

By the amendment already adopted secession is not forbidden, nor are officers of the Government of the United States even required to swear paramount allegiance to the national Government. By the amendment I have suggested secession, or attempts at secession, are not only forbidden but are forbidden under a distinct and formidable penalty. I think some such amendment should be grafted on the Constitution, and I deem it the duty of Congress to present it, in addition to the one already pending, to the States for adoption.

As for this bill, sir, I need scarcely say that it contains nothing whatever which can possibly be regarded as a guarantee. It is simply a law, a law which the Supreme Court will unquestionably annul, and which any coming Congress may repeal. It has no single element of stability, nothing which can guaranty anything to anybody beyond the day which witnesses its enactment. In my judgment the nation demands something more stable, more definite, more fundamental, more radical, something which reaches the very root of secession and plucks it up more thoroughly than anything contained either in this bill or in the constitutional amendment which has been proposed by Congress.

It will be objected, especially by gentlemen on the other side of the House, that these acts and amendments tend to a greater centralization and consolidation of power in the Government than is contemplated by the Constitution as it is. I cannot deny that. I concede that it does. But unless I am mistaken in my observation of the current of public sentiment, the war through which we have just passed has developed in the nation a feeling favorable to some further extension of the power of the General Government, a feeling that in some respects, those which the war has brought into special prominence, some enlargement of the national authority is desirable and necessary.

It cannot have escaped observation that this tendency to consolidation of Governments is going on all over the world. The sentiment is not peculiar to us. What we see going on in Europe every day shows that the tendency is toward centralization—the accumulation of national power. In Italy, where only a few years ago the tendency was toward a confederacy of separate States, it is now toward consolidation. We all see what has taken place in Germany within a year or two, where the whole people, obeying the same tendency, have followed the lead of their able and audacious statesman and consolidated that whole country into one powerful Government under the lead of Prussia. In the British North American Provinces a few years ago the tendency was toward separation—maintaining the rights and authority of each of the separate Provinces. Then came a brief interval in which annexation to the United States found favor. Now, the general tendency is toward consolidation in the hands of one general Government which shall wield the power of them all. Now, sir, we, under the ordinary operation of things, would not have been free from this same tendency. I think there has been from the day the Constitution was framed until the present time among a large portion of the people of this country a conviction that there ought to be more central authority; and although the doctrine of State rights received great development immediately after the formation of our Government, and acquired further force from the existence of slavery and the struggle of that institution to preserve itself, I think there has always been in the nation a desire for somewhat more of centralization and consolidation in the national authority. That central authority I admit should be kept within limits and watched with jealous care; for I agree thoroughly with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BAKER] when he declared the other day that he would rather trust the States with the defense of personal liberty than leave it in the hands of Congress.

But it is not wholly a question of personal liberty. The people do really look to the States for the preservation of personal liberty, but it is also more or less in the public mind a question of power, of grandeur, of consideration among other nations. Every man would rather belong to a great, powerful, and glorious nation than to a small State which can only wield a limited sovereign authority. The war has strengthened this feeling of national pride, this preference for national over State distinction; and while I admit the force of the objection and the necessity of watching carefully and keeping within proper bounds the development of this feeling, I think that some extension of national power must be expected.

But I must leave this line of remark and return to the subject more directly under discussion. The bill before the House, it seems to me, will be followed by certain practical consequences to which we should not shut our eyes. Its first effect will be to implant in each southern State a rival government to that which now exists. There will be two governments contending for ascendancy, one organized on the principles of those which exist there now—the States controlling the franchise—the other organized under the provisions of this bill, and resting upon universal suffrage dictated by Congress as its basis. It is impossible that they should not come into collision, first a collision of authority, then a collision of arms; and under the pretense of securing their peace and the rights of all we shall have given the southern States a fierce and bloody civil war. You will say that the power of the nation shall be exercised to sustain the governments which will be formed under our authority.

But who wields the force of the nation? Not Congress. We cannot direct the movements of the Army. That is done by the President of the United States, and you can scarcely venture to hope that, with his opinions, the new governments we propose to establish would be sustained with much vigor or effect. The practical effect of such a step as we are asked to take would be quite the reverse of the results we profess to seek. The honorable member from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTFIELD] said the other day that however our opinions might differ we all sought the same grand object—the peace, order, and prosperity of our common country; we all agreed that we could not afford to have the South become to this nation what Ireland has been to England and Hungary to Austria and Poland to Russia—a discontented, decaying, rebellious section of the common empire. I ask gentlemen to examine this bill in the light of that opinion. Is there anything in it which tends to promote peace in the southern States, where it is to take effect? Will it give any better security for the rights of any portion of their inhabitants? Is it not certain to stir up strife, to plant new seeds of discontent and of civil war, to array class against class and race against race in every State to be affected by its provisions?

There can be but one answer to these inquiries. No man can be so blind as to doubt that these will be its sure and its only results. I say nothing of its effect upon the general prosperity of the whole country. Whatever promotes discord and strife in the southern States postpones restoration, destroys commerce, repels capital, deranges the whole system of industry by which alone the very men who are the objects of our special care can live, diminishes the ability of those States to pay taxes and contribute their share to the common burdens, and in every way does most serious and lasting injury to all the interests of our common country. It seems to me quite clear that the bill can effect no good purpose whatever, either to the nation, to the southern States, to the colored race, or the men who have stood by the Union during the recent war. I cannot help believing that they will all be injured, seriously and fatally, by an attempt to carry its provisions into effect. The bill cannot possibly produce good results in any portion of the country. It cannot meet the national demand or satisfy the national expectations. Its advocacy may meet certain party exigencies and personal aspirations—I use the expression in no offensive sense—certain desires of individuals to carry out theories and try experiments of government, but beyond this I see no good purpose which it can possibly serve.

If it were possible to modify in certain unimportant and exasperating details, and without in the least impairing its real effectiveness and practical utility, that clause of the constitutional amendment already adopted which imposes disabilities upon certain classes of persons engaged in the rebellion; and if then, such an additional amendment as I have suggested, forbidding under penalty of forfeiture of all national representation during the pleasure of Congress, any attempt hereafter on the part of any State to secede; and if it were distinctly stated that upon the adoption of these amendments the States should be readmitted to representation, I believe all the amendments would be adopted promptly and cheerfully by three fourths of all the States, and that the Union could be restored upon that firm and enduring basis to more than its ancient peace, prosperity, and renown.

This is my belief. Others may not share it. They may think that none of these amendments can be adopted by three fourths of all the States. Very well; grant it. Those gentlemen who say this are not without a theory fully adequate to meet it; why not act upon that? They maintain that the actual sovereignty of the nation rests with those States which never renounced their share of it, and that three fourths of those States are as competent to ratify constitutional amendments as their representatives are to enact laws. My learned friend from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] holds this opinion and sustains it with his accustomed ability and eloquence. The argument in its support is certainly not without force, and the theory is held by some very able writers on constitutional law. But why do not those on this floor who hold it act upon it?

The member from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTFIELD] the other day sought to hold the Secretary of State responsible for dereliction of duty in this respect; and denounced him in what seemed to me very unbecoming terms, and with utterly undeserved severity, for failure in this regard. He did not deem it unworthy of himself or in violation of his self-respect to speak of the Secretary of State—venerable not more for age than for the signal services to his country and the cause of freedom everywhere, by which his long and laborious life, devoted wholly from early manhood to the public service, has been made illustrious—as a “perfidious old man;” perfidious, the gentleman says, in not having proclaimed, as required by law, the adoption of the constitutional amendment, for which three fourths of the loyal States have cast their votes. I cannot err in saying that the gentleman from Pennsylvania knew that there is no such law. The law requires the Secretary of State to certify the adoption of amendments when ratified by three fourths of all the States. He acts under that law. If Congress desires him to act upon another theory why not enact another law? If Congress believes that to be the true theory of the Constitution why not put it upon the statute-book?

And I may ask the same question in regard to action upon the whole subject of reconstruction. Why does not Congress—why does not that party which has an overwhelming majority in both branches—a majority large enough to render the veto a barren scepter in the hands of the Executive, do something that shall be final and effective? We hear much of the congressional policy, the policy of the dominant party, which the people are said to have indorsed, and which some of us are somewhat vehemently denounced for not supporting. But what is it, and why is it not enacted? Last year we were told it was the constitutional amendment; this year the same men who made that their basis then discard it now. Last year that man was untrue to his party obligations who did not stand by it; this year the man is declared to be faithless to his party who does. This is not meeting the expectations of the nation. Professions, declamations, menaces are not what the people demand, and they may well say to Congress, as the impatient Hamlet said to the murderers in the mimic play—

"Leave thy damnable faces, and begin."

If the majority has a policy of reconstruction let it bring that policy forward and take the responsibility of acting upon it. I am quite ready to vote for it if it commends itself to my judgment, and I am quite as ready to be outvoted and submit if it does not. But the country demands action of some kind upon this great subject, concerning which Congress has been talking, and doing nothing but talk, now for two successive sessions.

Mr. Speaker, I will not enter upon any of the other branches of this great subject which invite attention. I have very nearly exhausted my time, and I fear more than exhausted the patience, though not the indulgence, of the House. The political state of the country seems to me to become more and more complicated, unsatisfactory, and threatening every day that we sit here without action. Let us adopt some measures of reconstruction or restoration at the earliest possible moment. If we cannot get all we want let us take what we can get. The condition of the country requires decisive action. The feeling of the people demands it. I am not alarmed at the prospect of strife and collision, greatly as I should deprecate it as an injury to the country and a serious check on its prosperity. But I have too much faith in the inherent and irrepressible energy of the American people, in their self-respect and self-command, and in their devotion to their country and its cherished institutions, to allow me to believe that this nation is doomed to perish under any strife that can be waged upon its soil.

Every nation has had to earn its manhood, to fortify its frame, to strengthen its muscle by just such trials as we have encountered, but the end of which, it seems, we have not yet reached. Whatever further trials may await us I believe the nation will emerge from them strong, bold, and free, preserving its liberties as a Republic and enforcing its respect upon all the nations of the earth by its strength, its liberty, and its adherence to substantial justice and right in its dealings with its own people as with all the world.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I would like to make the first thing I say on this occasion the most agreeable thing which I shall say; and with that design I shall say first that I am not about to make an hour's speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, the man who is now the acting President of the United States once said to me, in speaking of a bill like the one now before the House, that it was a measure to dissolve the Union. That proposition has been so often repeated by members upon the other side of this Hall during the debates upon the subject now under consideration that I have thought the House would probably pardon me if I should attempt to condense into a few sentences a suggestion or two in regard to that declaration, repeated so often and worn out so thoroughly as it is; and with the purpose of making the shortest statement that I can, of condensing it into as few sentences as I can, I trust the House will pardon me for reading part of what I have to say about it. I say it now, not because it is either new or important—important I mean as presenting anything novel for the consideration of the House—I present it only because the declaration has been repeated again and again with apparent earnestness by gentlemen on the opposite side of this Hall and as being worthy the attention of gentlemen on this side.

Every argument and every view and every method of presentation and statement which ever has been or which ever can be devised to enforce this doctrine, to wit, that the nation has no power to guaranty to these revolted districts loyal republican governments, condense themselves into but two. One of these methods runs thus: that as all loyal men confess that by no secession, rebellion, or other possible or conceivable act of its people can any State, or the people thereof, withdraw from the Union, therefore these rebel States are in the Union. If in the Union then, as there can be no State in the Union which is not entitled to two Senators and at least one Representative, therefore these revolted States are entitled to such Senators and Representatives and to all the other powers and representations of States, and any legislation denying this is usurpation and unconstitutional. Now, it is absolutely self-evident that if this view establishes anything, it establishes this also, namely: that during the entire war these rebel States were entitled to elect our rulers, because if you admit that during the war these States and their people ceased to have such powers to elect Senators, Representatives, and Presidents, then you admit that it is possible for a State and people to do that which in law either forfeits or suspends their power to elect the nation's rulers, and the whole argument so far as based on this point is abandoned. Now, notice here that they who make this argument deny that individuals who go into rebellion can decitizenize themselves so as that the United States may, as to any individual, accept his renunciation of any power appertaining to citizenship, and declare him to have ceased to have the powers of one of the people, an elector of a State. Note carefully, also, that these same persons all maintain that it is wrong, and most of them that it is illegal, to try and punish as traitors those who waged this rebellion, and in pursuance of this doctrine their Representatives vote nearly solid against punishing as a traitor Davis, the head of the rebellion. Now, this it is averred is the constitutional law of the Republic.

Mr. Speaker, may I borrow from another (Mr. Greeley) a method of illustrating this kind of constitutional law?

Whatever is a principle of our Constitution is capable of being written out into explicit and affirmative requirements of the Constitution. Let us write the above constitutional law out into language, not unjust or tortured, but fairly stating what this doctrine affirms. It reads thus when written out:

Article nine, section one. Whenever hereafter a causeless rebellion shall arise, and war be waged against the United States, so great and bloody that the rebellion shall in fact abolish and overthrow all the constitutions and laws of eleven States of this Union which recognize the supreme authority of such Union, and shall remove from office all officers who have taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and shall enact and enforce in the place of such constitutions and laws only such as recognized the supreme authority of usurped and rebel governments, and in the place of such loyal officers shall put such legislators and officers alone as shall swear to support such rebellion, and shall kill, imprison, or banish all such persons in such eleven States as will not aid in the said war to destroy this Union, and shall continue to wage such war for four years, and therein shall kill three hundred thousand of the loyal people, and, by starving and other practices of barbarians, shall murder sixty thousand more, and shall inflict upon the nation a debt of $4,000,000,000, and shall lay waste and desolate the entire land, and shall not cease such war until totally overthrown in overwhelming and crushing defeat, then, and in all such cases, the people so actually engaged in such rebellion, war, starvings, poisonings, and other barbarous practices for the overthrow of the Government as aforesaid, shall not be deemed to have done any act forfeiting or suspending any power or privilege of a citizen of the United States, or of an elector in any State, not be deemed to have put it in the power of the United States to declare forfeited or even suspended any power of such persons to elect the rulers of the Republic; but, on the contrary, all such people, while so engaged, and the States, as bodies politic, which they compose, shall, during all said four years of war, be deemed and held to be true, loyal, and republican people and States of this Union; and as such shall, despite the prohibition of the United States, be entitled to elect one third of the Senators, Representatives, and presidential electors of the United States, and shall thereby be enabled in the Senate and House to defeat any act necessary to the existence of the Government of the United States, and which requires the assent of two thirds of such Houses or of either House. And moreover, it shall be lawful for those who originate, lead in, and execute such war, rebellion, and murders, at all times to be elected to the offices of President, Vice President, Senators, and Representatives of the United States. And neither by test oaths or otherwise shall it be lawful to exclude such leaders while engaged in such rebellion or afterward from being elected to or assuming such offices.

Mr. Speaker, the man who affirms that this is not a substantially just affirmation in the terms of express law, of the exact effect of the doctrine that the people of a State can do no act which deprives even temporarily such people and their States of the power to elect our rulers is either a false man or an imbecile; and with him I hold no debate. And he who, seeing the consequences of such a doctrine thus fairly written out into the terms of law, does not turn away from them with loathing and utter disgust is worse than either false or imbecile. He is a traitor! And here I leave that.

Mr. Speaker, that second and only other method to which I have alluded, of enforcing the position that the United States have no power to assume the organization of loyal republican governments in these revolted States can be accurately stated thus: it says that, admitting that during the force and usurpations of the war of rebellion, the rebels and their States ceased to have the power to elect our rulers, yet the rebellion being crushed, the violent overthrow of the old constitution and laws of these States ended, and the people having submitted after crushing defeat to the authority they failed to overthrow, then and thereupon these old State governments and such new ones as those so defeated may choose to form become at once republican and loyal States, and the United States have no control over the matter, either as to who shall be electors and take part in reviving these States, or as to when and upon what terms these States and their people shall resume the high power of States governing the Union!

Now, Mr. Speaker, if this be indeed the state of our constitutional law, then this too may be written out fully into the forms of express law. So written out in all its leading requirements and consequences, it reads as follows:

Article nine, section two. Whenever hereafter such a rebellion against this Union as is described in the first section of this article shall arise and be overthrown by the United States, then and in all such cases they who engaged in such rebellion, war, murders, starvings, poisonings, and other practices of barbarians, to the end that they might destroy the Government of the United States, shall, immediately upon their having their arms wrested from them, and while yet prisoners of war, have the right both as individuals and as the people and electors of their States to elect, and also to become the President, the Vice President, Senators, and Representatives of the United States. And such traitors shall, moreover, have the power to so frame their State constitution and laws that none shall be entitled to vote for the offices aforesaid except those who engaged in said rebellion; and the said traitors and the States which they compose shall be entitled thus to at once assume said control of the Government of the United States, although in fact none of them shall have either felt or professed any regret for such treason, and although they may remain as traitorous as ever toward the Government of the United States, and may in fact assume such powers for the overthrow of the Government of the United States, and this although those so taking said offices for traitorous purposes may compose a majority of both Houses of Congress. And it shall be unconstitutional and illegal for the United States, by joint committee of Congress or otherwise, to even inquire into the matter of the return to loyalty or into the other acts or purposes of the traitors aforesaid, or into the republican character or purposes of the governments of their said States. But, on the contrary, such rebels, and if they so order they alone, shall be, immediately upon their defeat as aforesaid, and while yet prisoners of war, entitled to assume and take control of the Government of the United States without inquiry, conditions, let, hindrance, or delay. And it shall, moreover, be unlawful to exclude such traitors from any of said offices either by requiring test oaths or otherwise, except only that each House of Congress may judge of the election and qualification of its own members, and expel if two thirds so order.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in this section I do not caricature or exaggerate, but on the contrary I far understate the appalling results of this position, which I consider a position which teaches that, in defiance of the sovereignty of this victor nation, and in the very teeth of its prohibitions, its rebel prisoners of war, at the very instant of their defeat, have the right—ay, sir, the right—as electors and rulers of sovereign States, to resume the control of their conqueror; and the right to vote out that awful life of the nation which their five hundred thousand murders done did not extinguish, but augmented into mightier being.

No, sir; no. This is not the law of your nation's existence; and your injured country—what one ever so wronged before?—has the right and power in these revolted districts to see to it that there shall be returned and guaranteed to them governments right loyal and right republican, the United States being judges.

Now, I have said all that I propose to say upon the general question of the power of Congress to pass the bill now before the House, or any other bill which shall provide for the organization of loyal republican governments in the revolted States; and to provide also for the government of the people of those States provisionally until such loyal State governments can be organized therein.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a suggestion about the sixth section of this bill, which declares rebellion to have wrought a forfeiture of two privileges of citizenship, to wit: the right to vote and hold office.

Some gentlemen here of learning see in that section a declaration that Congress can vote the Territories and people, loyal and disloyal, of our Union out of the national jurisdiction and into foreign Governments, and can attach new and unknown penalties to past disloyalty by mere act of law without conviction.

Sir, this seems to me a most strange and obvious error, and arises out of forgetting that all the rights and obligations of citizenship arise, not at all out of any criminal enactments, but out of that contract and bond which connects the citizen with his country, and which binds both to certain correlative duties. This mistake comes from forgetting what is self-evident without being stated at all, but which is stated by Vattel in these words:

"If the body of society or he who represents it [the Government] absolutely fail to discharge their obligations toward the citizen, the latter may withdraw himself; for, if one of the contracting parties does not observe his engagements, the other is no longer bound to fulfill his, as the contract is reciprocal between society and its members. It is on the same principle also that society may expel a member who violates its laws."

This right of Governments to withhold from them who discard all the obligations pertaining to their citizenship the powers and rights which come alone from performing these obligations is one which, by necessity, attaches to and inheres in the very nature and structure of all civil society, and has been acted upon and enforced as a self-evident right of all government in every stable Government that has existed since the world began. This identical principle was asserted at the origin of your Government in the legislation of every one of the States of the confederation; was repeated and reenacted by three, at least, of the first Congresses under the Constitution, and has been virtually reenacted by being kept in force by every subsequent Congress which ever met under the Constitution.

But, sir, I am not about to enter upon an argument which I submitted to this House upon a former day; and only allude to it now to submit to the House a single suggestion about it. It is this which is submitted as an illustration and a proof:

There is a child before you. He moves about in the simplicity of his young nature, unconscious of the dignity which is upon him. He goes under your flag to another country. There another Government injures his life, his property, or even a hair of his head. For that injury, sir, what ought to happen? Nay, sir, by the very law of your nation's life and honor what must happen? Now, nothing has occurred except that a foreign Government has put its hand in insult or injury upon a little boy, and he upon the other side of the globe, where midnight is when we have high noon. But then the boy was our country's and was under its flag. When the tidings come to us that that child was hurt, if needs be for his redress every sword in the land and every gun, every arm in the land and every heart, every drop of blood in the land and every dollar of money pass eagerly under requisition to the work of that child's redress; and for that redress your armies and navies start off in a procession which girdles the globe with the light of your banners.

And, sir, why all this? It is because that child bore with him what thank God and the armies of America, is to-day the highest of earthly dignities; higher than that which made the person of him of Tarsus sacred in the presence of a Hebrew mob. The boy was an American citizen.

But, Mr. Speaker, others are in foreign lands from our country; Mason, Slidell, Breckinridge are abroad. Should one of these be hurt as the boy was, who in this House will arise and say that his avenging belongs, by any law of the Constitution or of honor, law of men or of God, to his outraged country?

I will yield to any gentleman on the other side who will rise in his place and say that this Government should resent any insult or injury to such men. [After a pause.] There is no response; no voice in all the loyal section of the country will be heard to assert it. I therefore assume that their avenging belongs not to my country. Now, why not? Mason once did have the right to demand your protection, and he is unconvicted to-day. Why has he not the right to make the demand now? Why did your Government refuse to consider Thresher, unconvicted of any offense against your laws, as not entitled to the rights of an American citizen? Why did that man, (Mr. Webster,) who then administered your Department of State, and who is to stand forever in your country's history unmatched and solitary as the master of your constitutional and your public law, refuse to accord the protection of this Government to one who engaged in the Lopez expedition but who was unconvicted of any crime? Sir, in the light of history, of law, and of reason, there can be but one answer; that along with the repudiation of the obligations of citizenship the right to claim its privileges perishes in so far as the Government may choose to forfeit them. And it is upon this principle that we may rightly enact this section into law.

Now, I shall say nothing more about this sixth section than I have already said. My own objection to it is, that it fails to assert the right to life which my Government has; it is poor and impoverished in the extent to which it goes. I say here, in the name of the loyal people of this country, South and North, that if we fail to put its stamp of detestation upon the treason of these men, by prohibiting them from any rule and authority in that country, in so far as that prohibition shall be found by the United States to be requisite to retain the governments of the States and of the nation in truly loyal hands, we will stab to the heart that Government which we on all sides of the Hall love so well.

One illustrious in another age said what has passed into the proverbs of a foreign tongue. Dulce et decorum est pro patria mori. A distinguished Senator translated that to read, "It is sweet and decent to die for one's country." But, sir, let me once for all say now—perhaps the last time that I shall ever speak upon the subject in the American House of Representatives—that if my Government shall, in any policies of reconstruction that may be adopted, abandon to their fate the men of the South who stood by their country when their country so much needed friends there; the men who proved their love of country when to prove it meant to die; and who proved it by receiving upon their own and their wives' and children's defenseless heads the storm of a huge and merciless treason, and shall, now in the day of the nation's triumph, consign them and their little ones, and the power of their States, to the dominion of those who made the rebellion, and whose almost tenderest mercies and best loyalty the nation, appalled with horror, has just read in the fire and blood of Memphis and New Orleans massacres, and shall refuse to withhold from these authors and architects of our ruin such powers as the southern patriot's and the nation's safety demand to be withheld, then will indeed the day have come when for our country it will have ceased to be even decent to die, and when our country will itself be dead.

Mr. Speaker, I return to the House my thanks for the singular attention and kindness with which I have been listened to, and here quit the theme.

Mr. ROSS obtained the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Ross] will yield, I desire to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] desires to deliver a speech which has been postponed a long time by the discussion on this bill.

Mr. ROSS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. STEVENS. Some gentlemen have asked me whether I propose to call the previous question on this bill to-morrow. In answer to that, I may say that while I do not regret the length of time which has been occupied by this debate, especially after the noble speech to which we have just listened, yet I see such diversity of opinion on this side of the House upon any question of reconstruction that if I do not change my mind I shall to-morrow relieve the House from any question upon the merits of this bill by moving to lay it on the table.

THE NORFOLK RIOT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House of December 10, 1866, a report relative to the riot at Norfolk, Virginia, on the 16th of April, 1866; which, on motion of Mr. ELIOT, was referred to the Committee on Freedmen's Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REV. WILLIAM FINCHER.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter and other documents from the Commissioner of Freedmen relative to the imprisonment in Georgia of Rev. William Fincher, a missionary to the freedmen in that State; which, on motion of Mr. ELLIOT, was referred to the Committee on Freedmen's Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed an act (S. No. 503) for the relief of Mrs. Mary A. Dixon, of Alexandria, in the State of Virginia, widow of the late Turner Dixon, deceased, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. STEVENS. I now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and resume the consideration of the President's annual message.

Mr. MAYNARD. There are several bills on the Speaker's table which, as we are fast approaching the close of the session, it is desirable shall be referred to the appropriate committees. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield so that those bills may be taken up and referred.

Mr. STEVENS. I cannot yield for that purpose; the gentleman from Vermont has already been delayed too long. I insist on my motion. The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WELKER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the President's annual message, on which Mr. MERCUR was entitled to the floor.

Mr. MERCUR. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] with the understanding that I shall be entitled to the floor when he concludes.

FINANCIAL POLICY.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, so many schemes are afloat here that the public judgment is bewildered—sometimes one for the immediate retirement of compound-interest notes; sometimes for the substitution of United States notes for compound-interest notes and all other obligations of the United States falling due; and sometimes for the substitution of United States notes in lieu of those now furnished by the national banking associations—but whatever the merits of these associations as an original question, I must say that I should regard a measure to wind them up and the issue of an equal volume of currency by the United States as tantamount to a perpetual suspension of specie payments. This instability, the ever-recurring proposals of change in measures affecting and disturbing the whole interests of the country, is a vice of most deplorable magnitude, and which we as legislators should unremittingly labor to limit.

Mr. Chairman, much needless disputation is avoided by a precise definition and limitation of the terms employed to express propositions. If those who advocate specie payments and those who favor paper money would fix accurate bounds to the meaning of their words they might be found apart, but not so far apart as they themselves suppose. Those who are for resumption do not mean forthwith, and those who are against it do not mean non-resumption forever. Let them explain their positions and they would be nearer together than they now are; but while they indulge in loose talk they are as wide asunder as the poles.

It is true, resumption of specie payments by the Government cannot be obtained until there is some curtailment in the circulation of the legal-tender notes, say $200,000,000, nor perhaps until by stiffening the tariff we check the outgoing of California gold. But when resumption does occur it will at once unlock a large amount of specie hitherto withdrawn from circulation, and, prices being also reduced, a less amount of currency will be required. No disastrous effects need follow if the people and the Secretary of the Treasury only exercise a common prudence. All expect the country to face resumption at some time; and it is after all but a question as to what time will be the best and productive of the least amount of inconvenience. The men who have faith in the resurrection of gold and silver say we shall never have a better time than now. Those who have felt the fructifying effect of a flood of paper money—its first glow of expanding prices and its quiet mode of scaling debts—believe its potency inexhaustible, and demand that the flood shall never subside.

For my own part, I am persuaded if we start now we shall not reach the goal of resumption any earlier than the most devoted patrons of an exclusively paper-money system would wish.

In a season when prices have universally risen it is a matter of congratulation that the value of man has risen most of all. Skilled labor—the hand guided by educated brains and a free will—is appreciated. The world begins to find room for all her children, and never will good and willing workmen be forced to beg for employment. Whether paid in paper or gold, the wages of man the world over will rule higher for every slave that has been emancipated. On the return of specie payments the rank of labor will be more than relatively maintained.

Finance seems to be a subject which inspires all men, and each one is persuaded of the infallibility of his own gospel. The financial condition of no nation or individual is ever so sound that it may not be improved; and if admitted to be unsound the volunteer doctors and the wet and dry nurses, painfully prolific, propose remedies more to be dreaded than any malady. It is curious, too, to observe what progress is made in the science of wealth. Classic standards are no longer authority, and two and two no longer make four. To appreciate this progress one must turn his back upon Franklin and Hamilton and Gallatin. They believed that labor created wealth and that the public debt could be paid only by proper taxation. The new school, however, trust much to the miraculous efficacy of paper currency. Hand in hand with that, the laborer is taught that he can earn as much in six hours as he once earned in ten or twelve, or that if he is worthy of the age he need not work at all. Again, that with this invention diligently used taxation, always a great bore, may be handed over to posterity or any party who likes it. I regret that I have no such pleasing theories and no such delusive nostrums. I have no dream that we can add to the wealth of the country by any contrivance unaccompanied by honest labor, nor that we can long maintain public credit without taxes or by faith without works. Let us rather strive to give to labor its largest constant remuneration, and equally strive to sustain the Government by the smallest amount of taxation.

While some of the ablest intellects in France and England are seeking a road by which to escape the evils—the losses and hazards—of even a mixed currency, while they are becoming bullionists pure and simple, we have some men who should be statesmen studying schemes by which to perpetuate the prodigal use of that Government paper which was engendered by a gigantic war.

A speech on financial questions, bestudded with facts and figures, I know possesses few attractions compared with the many immediate and remote problems that arise on the great topic of reconstruction, and yet the subject is now one of even more pressing importance. If the sinners of the South can afford to delay repentance, we can afford to wait. I shall not ask any one here to adopt my arguments, which may be poor, but the facts presented I hope may have more to recommend them.

Never was it more important than now that we should fix our tax and revenue system upon a stable basis—to stand for a series of years—but, if our political condition did not forbid this, the unfunded national debt, and, above all, the immense volume of national bank and legal-tender currency, will not permit it. Ere this we ought to have been sailing on smooth seas; but beyond some palpable rocks, which may be avoided if we choose, what unexplored dangers lie in our path it is almost impossible to foretell, and yet all contingencies must be provided for. Our destiny is to be a great and powerful nation, or, if not that, then to follow in the long procession of extinct republics. There can be no middle ground. The United States must be a grand Power among the nations of the earth or nothing. The first sign of exhaustion, the first stumble of decrepitude, will be the signal for all of our foes to unite in crushing out our national existence. We must not forget in finding cruel enemies at home we also have been furnished with superabundant evidence that those who govern foreign nations are by no means our friends, but on the contrary they have exhibited a savage joy at every blow which made "freedom shriek" or retarded the triumph of the principles and supporters of a republican Government.

Earnestly seeking peace, and believing honorable peace possible, we yet may be flirited into war. We may be assailed, and thus be called upon to defend ourselves with all our might. If our financial condition is only sound we can easily bear the strain; but until we have our debts solidly funded, until they are held where they will not leap into the market and crush all domestic credits at the first croakings of alarm, an addition of another thousand millions of debt is to be avoided. A war to be supported by an inflated currency is devoutly to be shunned. I do not like the idea of being under perpetual bonds to keep the peace, and therefore it is our highest duty to insist, first and everywhere, on rigid economy; and second, to restore our finances to the normal condition—to the specie standard—at the earliest practicable moment. Producing more gold and silver than all the rest of the world, let us not endure the reproach that we do not know how to keep it after we have got it. Able to bring into the field the mightiest of armies, let us also be equally strong in our means of indefinite and independent support. Let any who may seek a war with us know from the outset that it will be one commensurate with our physical and geographical proportions and in no way inferior to our past history.

We must look at the sober facts before us. The inevitable expenses of the Government must be provided for. The interest on our public debt is estimated next year at $105,551,512, and, unless the perpetual paper propagandists shall prevail, upon the final redemption of the legal-tender currency this will be ultimately increased about twenty or twenty-five million dollars, or in the aggregate more than our whole public debt in 1816, when it reached the highest point ($127,334,993) prior to the recent rebellion.

Our Navy has been very largely increased, and it is not probable that it will ever shrink to its former narrow proportions. In this Department our annual expenditure will be $23,144,810 81, or nearly twice as much as before the war. The regular Army is now fixed at about fifty-four thousand men, but we have to provide for nearly ninety thousand for the coming year; eight thousand or eighteen thousand are forever obsolete; and it must be kept capable of instant and formidable expansion. The estimated cost for the War Department the coming year is $58,804,657 05. The extra bounty we provided for last year will amount to $80,000,000, all of which is yet to be paid.

The pension appropriation, instead of covering a few heroes of a hundred years as well as of the Revolution, and five or six thousand scarred soldiers of the war of 1812 and 1847, now embraces young men, but mutilated in service, in every city, town, and village, to the extent of nearly one hundred and twenty-five thousand; and instead of less than a million dollars, as in 1862, now requires $13,177,446, or as much as the whole expenses of the Government in 1824 and 1828. The war claims of several States, if that of Missouri, already reported upon at $7,000,000, may be regarded as a foretaste, will weigh heavily upon the Treasury.

The Indians, though reduced in numbers since the advent of the Pilgrim fathers from not less than fifteen millions to two hundred and ninety-five thousand seven hundred and seventy-four, maintain their nomadic and intractable character, requiring for each a mile square of territory for support where a white man would need but a few acres, and beyond this an annual and perpetual expenditure of $3,500,000 more, which does not include the large and variable sums it costs us out of the military chest to bestow upon them, for various provoked and unprovoked offenses, that Christian chastisement which the agents and traders who snatch and devour our amiable charities, think they need. Last year seven thousand nine hundred and nine Navajoes were held by us as prisoners in New Mexico at an expense of $1,500,000. The Freedmen's Bureau, in proportion to its value and importance the most economical expenditure of the Government, will cost for the coming year $10,350,265 55; but it has an unexpended fund on hand of two thirds of this amount. The elevation of the Indian may be hopeless; but fortunately the improvement of five millions of the African race is a possibility abundantly assured. With the most inflexible economy, without any guarantee that the Halls of Montezuma shall have restored the gold abstracted by Cortez, or without the indulgence of any other splendid folly, our entire expenditures for all purposes cannot be brought down to anything like the old standard of sixty or seventy millions per annum. Heavy taxation is at present unavoidable; but this will every year be sensibly diminished by increased wealth and increased population. Our task, if we are wise, will be at least biennially to relieve something from taxation. European nations, however, ambitious once more to maintain large armies in time of peace, compelled to make lavish expenditures for the maintenance of the balance of power, will annually have to seek some new object of taxation upon which new burdens may be imposed.

An unusual item, however, is this year to be provided for by the people, not by the Government, which will transfer a large sum from the United States to Europe. The Paris Exhibition will attract Americans, ever addicted to travel, by thousands, and there is some ground for the satire conveyed in the pretended cable dispatch, that Napoleon has set apart four acres as a grave-yard for American visitors who may not survive. It will be a very moderate estimate to calculate that seventy-five thousand persons will this year cross the Atlantic from the United States, and the cost will not be less than $1,500 each in gold, or a total of $112,500,000, which in currency would be over $150,000,000. Some will estimate the number much higher and the expenditures greater. It will hardly be less. This will swallow up the entire production of all our gold and silver mines for the year to come, or what is more likely, its equivalent in United States bonds, to be disposed of as the exigencies of individuals may require. Such a drain may be ill-timed, but there is no escape from it. For the present our lesson as a nation is economy, rest, abstinence. Hereafter we may revenge ourselves by calling a world's convention at St. Louis or upon the summit of the Rocky mountains.

I know that excellent men entertain much affection for paper money, although no one at the time of its recent introduction dreamed of its present overgrown proportions, nor of using it beyond the immediate war exigencies of the Government. Its use, justified only by an overwhelming necessity, was to be terminated with the first dawn of peace. I confess to a feeling almost of mortification in having the conviction that this question requires sober argument before an American Congress. How any friend of American industry can espouse the cause of an endless reign of paper currency, of which it takes one dollar and thirty, forty, or fifty cents to buy a dollar in specie, is to me incomprehensible. Iron ships are rapidly coming into use, but they can be built abroad and employed for one half the price they cost here. Will any American build an iron ship? Tenements for rent, unless already built, are no longer favorite investments for men having capital, and no poor man dares for a moment to indulge the idea of building a house and a home. Although all other circumstances, save only our depreciated currency, indicate a disposition and warrant in all parts of our country, North and South, East and West, to start new industrial enterprises, yet few such are actually started. Men will not invest expecting five years hence to lose one half of the sum invested.

Some gentlemen think that the premium on gold paid by the importers is ample compensation for all the griefs of American manufacturers. Never was there a greater fallacy. When the wants of the Government created both a demand and war prices for goods; when it was easier to sell than it was to buy; before labor and raw materials had advanced to the same ratio or beyond that of gold, then manufacturers were reaping princely harvests from the rise of raw materials and stocks on hand. All that is changed. Now raw material has been consumed and labor has advanced, but prices of finished manufactures have receded and are still receding. Many mills have already suspended, and others are working on short time. Certainly to embark in any new enterprise is deemed hazardous. Neither the great attractions of the West nor of the South can overcome the dreaded longevity of the race of "greenbacks." The bare difference in the cost of the permanent capital of English woolen manufacturing establishments and American gives to the English the mastery and ample dividends. Six years ago a woolen mill that would have cost $1,000,000 in New York or New England could have been put up—so much cheaper are raw materials and labor—for $500,000 in England. Permanent investments there which yield three and a half per cent. per annum are satisfactory. Here seven per cent. per annum is the least that would tempt capital to such enterprises, or that would anywhere be voluntarily accepted. To-day the prices of bricks, iron, machinery, and labor have so largely increased that such an establishment would here cost nearly double what it would six years ago, or $2,000,000. The interest upon this sum would be $140,000 per annum; but the interest of the British establishment—$500,000 at three and a half per cent.—is no more than $17,500. Here is $122,500 per annum in favor of the British manufacturer, a sum sufficient for very respectable dividends, certainly, on a capital of $500,000. Is it any wonder that we have an extraordinary influx of British goods, or that all Europe last year was swept to furnish the empty American markets?

Prior to the war the cost of the labor expended upon a yard of cotton cloth (64x64 printing) was nine mills, but now it is two cents and seven mills or three times the amount. A printer in Washington now gets twenty-four dollars per week and works but eight hours per day, where he formerly received fourteen dollars per week and worked ten hours per day; and yet he will tell you that his condition and means to support a family have not been bettered. A ton of English railroad iron in Wales is now sold for £5 10s. or $27 50; but it is estimated that the wages alone paid to workmen in Pennsylvania to produce a ton of rails amounts to sixty-five dollars, and of this a careful analysis shows $35 28 to be expended by them for agricultural productions. In spite of the high rates of the figures the laborer enjoys no more comforts than formerly. Our paper currency represents dimensions without gravity and its perpetuation must prove destructive to both employes and employers.

I am no defender of the politics of the Secretary of the Treasury. They have been and are as distasteful to me as to any of my friends. He is not, however, the first man who has sought distinction in a rôle for which he was unfitted. The author of Blackstone's Commentaries sought parliamentary position to increase his fame, but there his career is only remembered because Junius pointed at him his "slow, unmoving finger of scorn." John Quincy Adams was not always satisfied in the high career of a statesman, but sometimes attempted poetry, and "Dermot McMorrough" was the result. The political sins of the Secretary are patent, but according to Burns "we know not what has been resisted." Should we drive him from position, is it likely that any successor would have more of the confidence of the country? His recommendations, so far as I am concerned, shall not be condemned because made by him, only scrutinized. I do not think it will be very wise for Congress to get wrong on financial questions because the Secretary happens to be right, though wrong politically. For myself I shall not make the mistake of opposing him where my conscience assures me he is mainly sound and true. Although I think he has named a day for the resumption of specie payments somewhat earlier than it will be possible to achieve, yet the unalterable purpose to resume at an early day I have no doubt is sound in principle, policy, and morals, and if Congress shall thwart this purpose it will have doomed the country to long years of suffering. More than this: any party which shall undertake seriously to procrastinate the day of our redemption from the evils of an excessive paper currency, the evil of dear living, will at last be overwhelmed by its opponents, even though the latter may not be able at the time to extricate the country. Strong as we are we cannot afford to take the wrong side of such an issue.

On the 11th day of May, 1865, the premium on gold had fallen to one hundred and twenty-eight and a half per cent., having fallen from two hundred per cent. in March, and from a much higher point than that in January without producing a perceptible ripple in financial circles and far less a panic. There were twenty-seven hundred and thirty-three failures in 1860 in the United States, amounting to $61,739,473; but in 1865 there were only five hundred and thirty, amounting to $17,625,000, or about one fourth part of the average number and amount. Mortgages, made light, had been liquidated. The old system of mercantile credits by common consent had been banished. The South in losing all had lost its credit, and trust in that direction was impossible. All felt that to pay as you go was sound policy. The scriptural injunction "owe no man anything" had been implicitly obeyed, and then was the golden moment, not only for political reconstruction, but for a return to specie payments. Then the capital of the country was idle and might have been largely enlisted into the service of the country. The campaign of a paper currency was over, and it waited only to be honorably discharged. Useful once, it was now only an incumbrance.

The western States prior to the war were largely involved in debt, and they not only paid off an indebtedness of not less than $200,000,000, but they became large holders of United States securities with means of becoming still larger holders. Up to this time neither in the West nor in any other part of the country have our people asked or received the ancient measure of credits. Notwithstanding the drain of the war the great masses of the people are free from debt. Thanks at least, to the Secretary of the Treasury for having borne aloft the motto of an early resumption of specie payments. This, if no more, has prevented the country from an indefinite expansion of credits, from plunging headlong into debt; and never, in my opinion, shall we have a more auspicious moment to initiate measures for a vigorous retirement of the excess of our paper currency.

I wish I could believe that the Treasury estimates of the receipts from customs for the years 1867-68 were not too large, but I cannot, and instead of $145,000,000 if we get less by $20,000,000 it ought to content and be satisfactory to the country. The capacity of the South to consume and pay for immense importations has been vastly overrated, and the lake trade alone probably much exceeds the entire aggregate of the southern trade recently restored. The prompt action so generally expected upon the tariff bill now pending in the Senate, by which the rates of duties would be somewhat increased, for a time greatly stimulated importations, and we have had both a glut of merchandise and of revenue by no means to be anticipated for the coming year.

It is most likely the Secretary of the Treasury has underestimated the amount of United States bonds held abroad, and that instead of $350,000,000 not less than $500,000,000 of our national securities are so held. So long as these remain below par abroad they will be held more or less as fancy stocks, liable to be returned for realization at any moment. If they could be made equal to par it does not seem to me that the holders would part with a security for which they were receiving six per cent. interest in order to accept another no better at three and a half per cent. interest. Beyond a question when our bonds bring what they represent, dollar for dollar, a new loan payable abroad could be negotiated, if it were desirable, at five per cent. and perhaps at four and a half per cent. We shall ere long demonstrate that it is safer to trust the United States at three and a half per cent. than any other nation in the world, but first we must make our present obligations worth their par value in gold at home.

I wish it were true that the stocks of the United States were not to be found at all in foreign markets; but we are not rich enough to hold all the good things we produce. Is it not, however, a source of mortification that Massachusetts five per cent stock brings more in London than United States sixes? Or that Virginia five per cents bring only twenty per cent. less? Are we quite content that Egyptian, (quoted at 84,) Turkish, (98,) Brazilian, (98,) and even Moorish, (98,) stocks shall be quoted much higher than the best of United States stocks? Some of these loans at four per cent., of Governments greatly inferior, as we think, to that of the United States, bring higher prices than our six per cent. loans. I do not wish swiftly to put large profits in the pockets of our creditors, but those who obtained our stocks at less than par made their profits at the time of purchase, as it was to have been expected the Government would pay to the uttermost farthing all it promised, principal and interest, and those who relied upon the good faith of our Government, or who may hereafter so rely, will never receive less. No other Government has met its obligations with more punctuality. If slowly, the world will surely yet acknowledge the fact. But our creditors are receiving eight or nine per cent. while gold commands its present rate of premium. On $2,000,000 of debt this profit of our creditors amounts to over forty millions per annum.

The problem of how much currency or circulating medium any country requires for the healthful transaction of its business is one having so many points of disturbance that its actual solution is one of some difficulty. Each examiner will vary the result according to the data included or excluded, and probably according to the theory he wishes to build up or demolish. I propose to present some facts upon this subject that to me seem important, and to which I invite the consideration of the House.

The entire amount of bank-note circulation of the whole country in January, 1862, was $184,000,000, and of this $40,000,000 belonged to the southern States. The maximum amount of bank-note circulation at no previous time has gone beyond $214,778,822, and the circulation in 1860 was $207,802,000, and that was a year of as large production and of as much general prosperity as any perhaps in our history. To the amount of paper there must be added a small amount for specie in daily circulation. Doubtless there was $200,000,000 of specie in the country, but that held by banks is represented by paper, an equal amount of which is usually retired whenever specie is demanded and temporarily brought into use. A considerable amount, as there ever will be, was hoarded or in transitu as merchandise.

The business of the country was not larger in 1866, certainly, than it was in 1860, except in national taxes, and these unquestionably create a demand for some increase of the circulating medium, and as unquestionably to some extent diminish the business of the country. It is a great convenience, however, that the medium should be of a national character and current in all parts of the country.

With what propriety can it be claimed that the business of the country requires the vast volume of paper currency which now inundates the land? Let us look at it:

Paper currency now in circulation, (December 1, 1866.)

Notes of State banks.....	$36,785,035 00
Notes of State banks converted, now outstanding.....	9,748,025 00
United States notes, legal tender.....	385,441,849 00
Fractional currency.....	28,620,249 93
Circulation issued to national banks.....	292,671,753 00
	<hr/> $753,236,911 93

In 1862 the circulation of bank notes of the southern States was $40,000,000, and was at the outset of the rebellion much increased; but the confederate currency was subsequently largely substituted for it, and the amount now outstanding certainly does not exceed that sum, and its chief value lies in the fact that the creditors of the banks can use it to pay their debts. I shall not bring the $1,000,000,000 of Jeff. Davis's king-cotton currency into the account. That, in "swinging around the circle," seems to have been condemned and executed even before its authors.

West of the Rocky mountains, on the Pacific slope, gold and silver has maintained its sovereignty and very little paper has got into circulation. The amount of gold and silver coin is probably considerably greater there to-day than it was six years ago, and may be estimated in all the States and Territories at $25,000,000. Throughout the country, and particularly where merchandise is distributed at wholesale, there are many articles bought and sold exclusively for gold, and no other prices are quoted for them. Instead of coin, gold bars or bullion is very largely used by banks and by importers to pay for foreign merchandise. These circumstances keep some small portion of the gold coinage from being wholly demonetized. The copper and nickel coinage has been depreciated so that a five-cent token contains about one cent of real value, or until it is almost as light as any paper which can be produced, even by the genius of the hydrostatic power at the Treasury Department, and it once more rises and floats triumphantly over the dirty sea of paper currency in vulgar fractions. The gold certificates of deposit, issued by millions, help to swell our circulation, being conveniently and daily used for many purposes, especially to pay for exchange in the liquidation of foreign accounts and among gold operators. Bills of exchange are in fact currency, and the amount afloat is enormous.

The compound-interest notes are largely used, and almost universally, though without authority, take the place of United States legal-tender notes in the reserve required to be held by national banks. Even the seven-thirties often take the place of lawful money, and are given and taken in financial transactions at their current value. To some extent the coupon bonds of the United States are used as money and are remitted to pay balances due, especially balances of trade due abroad.

To the circulation already mentioned, it is fair, then, to add the most considerable part of the following items:

Gold certificates of deposit.....	$19,638,500
Compound-interest notes.....	147,387,140
Specie in actual circulation on the Pacific	25,000,000
Specie in actual circulation in the Atlantic States.....	15,000,000
Copper and nickel.....	3,000,000
	<hr/> $210,023,640

This, added to the first series of items, makes the whole of our present currency $963,290,551 93, or in round numbers nearly one thousand million dollars, to do actually less business than we were doing six years ago, when we did not have nor require one fourth part of the sum!

The four millions per month of Government paper authorized to be retired last year has been more than compensated by the increase of national bank paper, and paper currency, therefore, still maintains its supremest bulk. We produce of gold and silver $8,000,000 per month, and yet higgie about retiring within the same time $4,000,000 of paper.

The amount of notes authorized to be issued by the Bank of England is £11,000,000, or $55,000,000; and the entire amount of paper circulation in Great Britain, including private and joint-stock banks, as established by act of Parliament in 1844, was £37,000,000, or $185,000,000. Some years it has been a trifle more than this and some years a trifle less; but in 1865, strained as they were for capital to buy and hold cotton at its advanced price, the amount did not go beyond £39,129,789. Beyond doubt the trade and commerce of Great Britain vastly exceeds that of our own or any other nation. Its exports in 1864 were $2,545,000,000, and yet they find $185,000,000 of paper money equal to all their ordinary demands. How is it that it can be pretended we require so much more? During the war it was claimed that the enormous transactions of the Government absorbed hundreds of millions, and doubtless the money paid to our armies in distant fields did not find its way to commercial centers as quickly as it would if it had flowed through the ordinary channels of trade; but the Government changed business, did not increase it, and if it did, the war has ceased and the Government is no longer the grand purchaser and consumer of everything upon which it can lay its hands. It is an absurdity to suppose that we require five times as much paper money as Great Britain to do less than half as much business. But the facilities now in use for the transaction of business by houses engaged in large operations, outside of the use of money of any kind, although known, are generally vastly underrated. A member of Parliament recently declared that it required no more currency to do the business of Great Britain now than it did twenty years ago, when the business was only half as large.

There will be found in one of the parliamentary reports of 1858 (Evid., p. 165) the testimony given by Mr. Slater, a member of a firm in London largely engaged in commercial transactions, ranging over several millions sterling yearly, which showed that their receipts and payments in the ordinary course of business, when carefully analyzed, held the following ratio for one hundred parts:

Receipts.
Bank of England notes.....	7 per cent.
Gold and silver.....	3 per cent.
Bankers' drafts and checks.....	90 per cent.
Total.....	<hr/> 100 per cent.

Payments.
Bank of England notes.....	2 per cent.
Gold and silver.....	1 per cent.
Bills of exchange and checks.....	97 per cent.
Total.....	<hr/> 100 per cent.

The business of this firm was analogous to that of any of our large merchants or traders in New York, and proves conclusively that the credit and capital of the people are used to the extent of ninety to ninety-seven per cent. in ordinary mercantile transactions, and that neither gold and silver nor paper convertible into gold and silver is used for a circulating medium beyond from three to ten per cent.

This fact is strikingly illustrated by the New York bank exchanges or money transactions for a single day; for example, take one in the year 1863, amounting to $91,291,431, which was performed by the use of $2,807,396 in money. In the year 1854 the bank exchanges were $5,862,912,098, and the balances or money used daily were under one million dollars. For this data I am indebted to a former eminent member of this House, (Colonel Stebbins.) This experience of New York tallies very closely with the testimony in the parliamentary report, that it only requires about three per cent. in money to liquidate all payments in modern trading. If it were not mischievous it would be ridiculous to claim that there is a necessity for the continuance of our present excessive amount of paper money.

Mr. Charles Buller, in the House of Commons, stated that the amount of bank paper in 1834 was between twenty-six and twenty-seven million pounds, while the amount of bills of exchange in circulation at one time in the same year was £182,123,000, or five times the amount of bank notes.

On the 1st day of January, 1866, the whole bank capital of the country amounted to $403,357,346; but a much more active and larger capital was made up of individual deposits, which at the same date amounted to $513,608,888. By means of the checks of depositors this may be and is drawn out daily, and by checks of other depositors or other bankable funds an equal amount may be deposited. At the same time it is perfectly safe for any bank to calculate that at the close of business each day the sum total of the deposits will remain nearly unchanged, and thereby the basis of discounts is very much enlarged. Thus the credit of individuals at the banks plays by far the most important figure in modern financial transactions, and does away with the necessity of a large volume of bank note circulation, besides more than doubling the aggregate working capital of the banks.

An unvarying standard of money has been the desideratum of the world, but it has not yet been found. Gold and silver have been almost universally accepted as the nearest approximation to that end, because these metals have great intrinsic value in proportion to weight, and are portable and durable. But a bushel of grain in old and long-settled countries has been considered a more unvarying standard of prices than even gold, on the ground that it requires a more uniform amount of labor to produce it. But a uniform standard, however desirable, appears impossible. Labor in one country is worth more than in another, and worth more in cities and towns than in rural districts, because money is there more abundant and purchases less of the absolute necessities of life. Educated or skilled labor is more valuable than the uneducated, because more productive. Labor is worth more in the spring-time and harvest than in winter, notwithstanding it costs the laborer more in clothing, food, and exposure, because in the winter unemployed laborers become abundant. Agricultural labor being interrupted, many who follow it in its season pursue the trade of artisans during the winter, and thereby depress the prices of such labor in towns and cities. Prairie lands combined with labor-saving agricultural implements have reduced the price of grain in the Western States, but the labor to effect distant transportation prevents any very large reduction in the prices which the world at large continues to pay. A day's work in the United States may be worth twice as much as in Mexico; but if one thousand men in the United States produce one thousand ounces of gold or silver for the same amount of labor it requires in Mexico to produce two hundred and fifty ounces, transportation no longer interferes, and the price in Mexico will fall one half, or it will take twice as much gold or silver to make the same purchase as before. It is to be noted, however, that Chinese labor, being that largely employed in our mining regions, is quite as cheap as that employed in Mexican mines.

In point of fact the surpassing abundance of the precious metals, especially that of gold, discovered within the last eighteen years—California being already eclipsed by the Colonies of Great Britain—and the facility and cheapness with which they are obtained, has so cheapened the markets of the world that gold itself has rapidly depreciated and nowhere purchases as much as it would in 1850. So copious are the supplies, multiplied suddenly at so many different points on the globe, that it may be expected at an early day to be valued, like any other article, at no more than the cost of extraction. Whether the enormous increase of the precious metals may not ultimately destroy them as a measure of value, as was apprehended upon the first opening of the golden treasures of California and Australia, remains yet to be seen. The extraordinary drain of silver to the Asiatic nations will not forever postpone the question. It seems probable, however, if this drain should continue even for a short time longer that all nations will either abandon the use of silver coins or they must speedily debase them. Otherwise their commercial price so much exceeds the currency value as compared with gold they will be melted up. In 1800 the value of gold produced stood to that of silver in the proportion of twenty-eight to seventy-two in a total of $54,000,000; but in 1863, when the production had been quintupled, the proportions were nearly reversed, and gold stood as sixty-seven to thirty-three. In fact the increase of silver is small, while gold has quadrupled. Macaulay's New Zealander may find among other wonders a thousand years hence a pound of silver valued at fifteen pounds of gold.

In 1830 it was estimated that for the preceding nineteen years the average annual production of the precious metals had fallen off about $31,000,000 from what it had been prior to that time.

	Productions before 1810.	Productions after 1810.

The amount of gold and bullion in Europe in 1847 was estimated to have been $1,200,000,000. The accessions to this general stock of gold in the world since have been prodigious, but prior to 1848, for more than thirty years, the annual supplies did not much more than equal the annual waste. I am not able to obtain any consecutive returns of the amount produced in Mexico, South America, Russia, or Africa, and only imperfect returns of what has been produced in the United States and in Australia, but it is known that productions have been increasing largely, and probably the aggregate annual production in the United States alone is now nearly equal to the amount produced by both the United States and Australia a few years ago.

To these statements should be added from ten to twenty per cent. for what is not reported. Mr. Homans, of the Bankers' Magazine, estimated the production of gold and silver in 1863 as follows:

California.....	$70,000,000
Other portions of the United States.....	30,000,000

The following is the estimate of M. Chevalier, June, 1866, (see Journal des Economistes.)

Total.....	1,326,026,000
at five francs per dollar, equal to.....	$265,205,200

These estimates, made up from different sources and from different stand-points, serve to prove each other, and beyond doubt are very near the truth.

Within the last ten years, for which I have no returns, the very reliable estimates already given for 1863 and 1866 would show that more than treble the amount has been produced than for the six years for which I have given the returns. These facts conclusively show, apart from the action of a paper currency, that gold must have irremediably fallen in intrinsic value. It has become cheap by its abundance. What occurred after the discovery of the silver mines of Potosi in 1545 is again stamping itself upon history. There is, therefore, no occasion for any other depreciation than that which must inevitably befall us on account of the annual addition which has been and will be made to the general stock of gold and silver in the world for generations yet to come.

We keep up mints and assay offices at great expense, but it is clear that on the whole not one fourth part of the sums coined are retained by the country. Of all we have coined, in other words, three fourths or more has left the country. The impress of the American eagle gives no patriotism to coin, and it changes its allegiance—as did the coins of other nations in past ages, though forbid by Draconian laws—whenever tempted by any interest possibly computable. The following table shows the work of our mints and assay offices since first established:

Gold coinage is.....	$845,536,600	79
Silver coinage is.....	136,351,812	96
Copper coinage is.....	5,535,623	55
	$987,424,037	30

Where is it? Most of it has disappeared, rated at the value of the pure metal contained, and not a whit advanced by the artists of the Mint.

Among other modes of reducing the standard value of money, Congress began as early as 1837 by debasing our gold and silver coins, and declared that of one thousand parts nine hundred should be of pure metal and one hundred parts alloy. The standard of British gold is one part alloy in every twelve; but we have no coins which are not debased at least one part in every ten. At that time gold could be more profitably exported than silver, and this measure was designed not only to make the legal value of the two equivalent to their relative commercial value, but to bring gold into more general circulation. Neither object was secured. The rates of value, of fifteen or sixteen to one, soon became obsolete, and gold coins, although the standard was purposely placed below that of silver, were still exported. In order to retain in the country any silver, which, being worth more than its legal-tender value, bore a premium and was sold as a commodity, it then became necessary to reduce the weight of the silver coinage, and the half dollar in 1853 was reduced from two hundred and six and a quarter grains to one hundred and ninety-two grains, and fractional parts to the same proportion. Silver dollars at once disappeared, and eagles bearing date prior to 1837, being worth in proportion to the new eagles $10 66, also disappeared. The weight of these in 1791, standard gold, was two hundred and seventy grains, but in 1837 they were reduced to two hundred and fifty-eight grains. The debasement of our coinage, never entirely pure, was thus about seven per cent.

Foreign coins; beyond our power to debase, have been of course permitted to be rated at an increased valuation. The pound sterling of Great Britain, or sovereign, was made a lawful tender in 1794 at $4 44, and in 1842 it was raised to $4 84—being an increase of over nine per cent.

It will be seen from this recital that the standard of the United States coinage is very low, and the normal condition of exchange with most other civilized nations is always against us. Exchange on London when at not over nine and a half per cent. is really at par. When our paper money is promptly convertible into specie it is still much below the par of the countries with which we have the largest commercial transactions. Our gold coins are received abroad, not according to the value we stamp upon them, but according to the amount of pure gold they contain. It would seem almost inexcusable to allow our paper money to remain depreciated below the standard of specie as fixed by ourselves for any period more protracted than is now imperatively necessary. Bank notes, when they are made equivalent to the standard of United States coin, will be none too valuable. The second, third, and fourth dilution of money would not be tolerated by even Bismarck.

But the value of anything circulating as money diminishes both in proportion to its abundance and in proportion to the swiftness with which it changes hands. Holders of what is called money below the standard of the world are always eager to part with it; they never hoard it. They invest it either in something more solid or are happy to be rid of it for even such extravagances as they would feel could not otherwise be afforded. The American people at all times possess a wonderful facility for bargain-making, and an abundance of paper money exaggerates this national aptitude.

In the United States the same sum of money probably changes hand twice as frequently as in England, and in England three times more frequently than in France, and in France twice as frequently as in Spain, and in Spain five times more frequently than in Russia or Turkey. China and India appear to be Serboman bogs, where specie once introduced never more comes to the light. It goes and stays there perhaps because it will buy more labor there than elsewhere; it is irrecoverably lost, at all events, to modern commerce. Years ago a high authority laid it down as an axiom: "Given the comparative abundance of money, its market value will vary as the rapidity of the circulation. Given the rapidity of its circulation, the market value will vary as its comparative abundance. Given both the quantity and rapidity, its value will vary as the economy in its use."

If this be true, almost any nation would feel the evils of a redundant currency less than that of the United States, because the rapidity of circulation elsewhere would be generally far more sluggish.

The effects of an inflated currency, by creating suddenly a nominal increase of values, has demoralized the nation. Men quit work and buy property for a rise, although the rise may have ceased. The Jew in Boston, who had heard of some parties who made fortunes by failing, shut up his store, although owing nothing, and traveled about all day saying he had failed. Toward night he reopened his store, and said that he had failed ever since nine o'clock in the morning, and had not made a single cent! If the speculators would go back to their proper avocations, like the Jew, it would be all very well; but they will not. Staid men become adventurous, and adventurers become desperate. Haste to be rich fires the brain, and he who has no elephant or no fancy stocks ready to water and dispose of to green friends is a fossil of a by-gone age. Even the unsophisticated representatives of the rural population, attracted by the history of some lucky city gambler, (or "gold operator," the polite do call it,) rush toward towns and cities, eager for sudden wealth, and are ready to sully character for an unsullied equipage, believing the splendors of an establishment may conceal a shabby soul.

The urban population everywhere gain in numbers at the expense of the rural. Town and city rents are fabulously dear, and not even the cholera retards their rise. Hotels are filled, notwithstanding members of Congress from the Pacific find it cheaper to cross the Atlantic and spend the vacation in Europe rather than risk a four-months' reckoning with an American landlord. Industry, whether agricultural, manufacturing, or mechanical, is no longer attractive when fortunes are lost by wise men and are gobbled up by fools. A few may gain what others lose by bold and remorseless speculation; but the masses, trained to legitimate business and to honest labor, are daily growing poorer in pocket while they are daily exposed to deeper ruin by the seductive influences of those who seem to fly to fortune on the expanded wings of a paper currency. Let us set the gold operators and all who follow kindred trades at work in some honest calling. At least we may dry up the fountain from which flows their present means of intoxication.

It is a significant fact that our great eras of financial distress have occurred just at the moment when we have had the maximum amount of paper money inflation and when we were at profound peace with all the world. The bank-note circulation of the United States from January, 1830, to January, 1837, rose from $61,324,000 to $149,185,890, and then came the financial collapse from which the country did not recover for more than five years, or until 1843, when the bank circulation had been reduced to $58,564,000. In 1857 another period of sharp distress and great embarrassment was experienced throughout the country. At this time the bank-note circulation had swollen to—the highest point then ever known—$214,778,822. An excessive rise of the circulation of paper would seem almost as surely to pre-empt a storm in the financial world as the sudden sinking of the mercury in the barometer denotes a violent change in the atmospherical world. Under such circumstances the skillful mariner will trim his canvas so as to weather the rough dangers he may be called upon to pass through. While the war raged we had to run fearful risks, stretching every rag of sail, with our admirals lashed to the masthead, and came off victorious. Now, with all our craft safely in harbor, it would be disgraceful to sink by insisting upon carrying full sail instead of throwing an anchor or by neglecting to trim the ship with proper ballast after being unladen. Thus far we have escaped any commercial tornadoes, but if we should be visited by such a calamity—the usual sequence of war—it is too obvious that we are exposed to something of unrecorded severity.

Any excess of currency adds nothing to actual values. Calling a dollar a dollar and a half only brings along the necessity for marking up the price of every exchangeable commodity correspondingly. If this were to be done with mathematical exactness nobody would be the gainer or the loser. But our circumstances are peculiar. We know and have faith that every dollar issued by the Government will be actually redeemed and paid, and probably within five years. So that any one can afford on this hypothesis to invest gold in United States notes and hold them idle until redeemed for much less than even the present premium on gold, and would probably gain much more than six per cent. interest according even to the present rate of discount on legal tenders. Notwithstanding that the present inflation of paper ought naturally to carry the price of gold much higher than it now is, this all-pervading conviction largely controls the rate of discount. If the public faith on this point should undergo a change and the time of specie resumption appear to be uncertain or postponed, there is no power which could prevent the premium on gold from bounding up to some of its highest altitudes. Let Congress become weak and vacillating and we should soon see our currency as buoyant as soap-bubbles and with hardly more purchasing power. During the war, at whatever sacrifice of present comfort, the people back of us conducted themselves and voted like statesmen. Let us not suffer in comparison by an exhibition here of a more contracted vision when the light is more abundant.

The ratio between gold and paper is not the true one. Producing a large surplus of gold, if naturally is and forever will be cheaper here than elsewhere. But we have depressed it by making it a commodity which we are obliged to sell for what the world will give. We can spare it more readily than anything else. The Government requires gold to be paid at the custom-house and it pays out an equal amount at the sub-Treasury. That is the inflexible and perpetual measure of our wants. Beyond this neither Government nor people have any use for it. Banks have long since removed it from their vaults. It is the cheapest thing we have to sell. So long as this continues we are maintaining the paper system to the great advantage of foreign nations and to our own loss. While it continues we shall be the subjects of foreign plunder and the spoil of gold speculators. Every man's property is at the mercy of the wild waves of an inflated currency.

All our experience shows that excessive issues of paper money have been followed by excessive importations of foreign goods. When the struggle with Napoleon was over it was not until years later that England resumed specie payments, during which her material progress was comparatively stationary, and her magnificent strides in trade and commerce bear date subsequent to this period. When the bank-note circulation of the United States was so largely expanded in 1836 our imports reached the large sum of $189,980,035, having risen from $70,876,920 in 1830. At the same time our exports of domestic produce were only $106,916,680. Again, under like circumstances, in 1857 the imports rose to $360,890,141, having been no more than $178,138,318 in 1850. At the same periods the excess of specie and bullion exported was very large. The net imports of foreign merchandise the past year, valued in gold, amounted to $417,046,577, of which over $125,000,000 were in dry goods! The close of the rebellion let loose at high prices a vast amount of cotton; but we exchanged it at once for dress goods. These facts would seem to show that the higher law of trade and commerce exercises a pitiless rigor against those nations which tolerate an excessive circulation of paper money.

It is often said that the United States if the legal-tender issues were withdrawn would be a loser by the amount of increased interest. The commercial health of the country is of tenfold more value than $24,000,000 to the Government. With inconvertible paper health is impossible, but with health we could easily negotiate all loans for one sixth less interest. The $300,000,000 of national bank currency that would then be convertible, being over fifty per cent. more than we had in 1860, would be an ample supply for the wants of trade. But while we are befogged with paper currency redeemable in other paper currency and that not redeemable at all—the worst conceivable form of inflation—Congress will make lavish appropriations and the expenditures of the Government will be unnecessarily expanded at every session far more than any loss to be incurred on the score of interest by funding the United States notes. As legislators we come to hold money cheap. Familiarity with millions has bred a contempt for paltry sums, and it seems cowardice to shrink from any proposal merely because the figures are larger than would once have sufficed. Put off the day of payment and we count large sums as trifles, forgetting that each dollar of every man's skin will cost some one of our countrymen the sweat of a hard day's work. It is the golden moment for the party now in power to turn its attention to the dry subject of economy and stem the tide flowing out from the Treasury, for the day will approach when our course will not fail to be reviewed by tax-payers. If we cannot now reduce taxation largely we can do much more by largely reducing our appropriations. If we prevent all raids upon the Treasury we shall entitle ourselves to imperishable gratitude.

From the facts to which I have already called the attention of the House it would appear to be demonstrated that the simultaneous discovery of new auriferous deposits in various parts of the world, of marvelous extent and richness, has rapidly and forever depressed the standard value of gold, whether as a currency or as a commodity, throughout all civilized nations, and that the United States standard of the precious metals used as currency has been depreciated from time to time, either by alloy or diminished weight, until it compares unfavorably with that of other nations; that while we have already entirely extinguished or propose to extinguish the circulation of State banks, we have supplied its place and much more by the creation of a family of national banks, whose issues alone are one hundred millions greater than the circulation displaced—issues everywhere practically irredeemable and inconvertible, and only claiming to be convertible at some time or other into other paper currency of still larger proportions, which the Government will in some way and at some time redeem, if it does not choose instead to go more deeply into the monopoly of fancy-colored paper money; that deposits, bills of exchange, and checks of individuals really possess in commercial transactions all the functions of bank-note currency, and in modern times are used at least nine times more extensively, and therefore, in proportion to the business of the world, far less money is actually required than formerly; that the rapidity of the circulation of money, or whatever circulates as money, greatly magnifies any currency which may be used in the United States; that the immensity of our paper money circulation tends to the spread of unthrifty habits and induces extravagance on the part of Congress and the Executive Departments as well as the people; that a postponement of the time of resumption will find our people less prepared, more deeply in debt, the banks with a heavier line of discounts, and the credit system more expanded everywhere than now for a wise, steady, and prudent adherence to the idea of an early resumption; and without this cardinal idea always in front we are in danger, in the face of a diminishing revenue, of no resumption at all.

A violent or abrupt contraction of the present volume of paper currency might not be advisable, and with the ever-present interest of the Treasury urging the maintenance of an easy money market, there is no danger of its occurrence; but a moderate and persistent contraction of the flood within its old embankments is advisable in order to restore health and vigor to languishing industries and in order to build up our greatness as a nation upon that impregnable foundation for which the material, not more precious than solid, has been placed by Providence within our reach, and in greater abundance than is to be found in all other countries beside. We have just emerged from a most expensive war, and ought to exhibit that spirit which success justly inspires, grappling with the financial difficulties remaining as part of our inheritance with the courage that conquers, and thus secure the vital interests of our own people while we challenge the respect of foreign nations.

FIRST CONGREGATIONAL SOCIETY.

I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House to the bill; which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert the following:

That Hiram Barber, Roswell H. Stevens, Charles H. Howard, Silas H. Hodges, Henry A. Brewster, John W. Rumsey, David M. Kelsey, Abner T. Longley, Benjamin F. Morris, William T. Bascom, S. C. SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the first meeting of said society shall be holden at the time and place at which a majority of the persons herein above-named shall assemble for that purpose; and six days' notice shall be given each of said corporators; at which meeting, and at all annual meetings, and at all meetings specially called for that object, said society may enact, amend, or repeal by-laws regulating the government of said society; prescribing the number, character, and duties of their officers, and the manner of their election; defining the terms on which members may be admitted to it, and shall cease to be such; and providing in all things for the management of the affairs of said society or for securing its interests and welfare.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

HABEAS CORPUS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 755.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 755) amendatory of an act to amend an act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved May 11, 1866.

The bill provides that whenever any suit or prosecution which has been or may be commenced in any State court, and which the defendant is authorized to have removed from that court to the circuit court of the United States, under and by virtue of the provisions of an act relating to habeas corpus, and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases, approved March 3, 1863, or by virtue of the act amendatory thereof, approved May 11, 1866, and all the acts necessary for the removal of the cause to the circuit court shall have been performed, and the defendant in any suit shall be in actual custody on process issued by the State court, it is to be the duty of the clerk of the circuit court of the United States to issue a writ of habeas corpus cum causa; and it is to be the duty of the marshal, by virtue of the writ of habeas corpus, to take the body of the defendant into his custody to be dealt with in the circuit court according to rules of law, and the orders of the court, or of any judge thereof in vacation; and he is to file a duplicate copy of the writ of habeas corpus with the clerk of the State court in which the suit was commenced, or deliver the duplicate to the clerk of the court; and all attachments made, and all bail and other security given in any suit or prosecution which has been or shall be removed from any State court to the circuit court of the United States, in pursuance of law, is to be and continue in like force and effect as if the suit had proceeded to final judgment and execution in the State court.

Mr. JOHNSON. Was that bill referred to a committee and reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will state to the Senator from Maryland that the bill was reported at the last session of Congress, and has been on the Calendar ever since.

Mr. HENDRICKS. My recollection of this bill is, that it only relates to cases in which there has been an arrest in the State courts and relieves from that arrest after proceedings have been taken according to law to take the case into the United States court. I did not know the bill was to be called up this morning. If that be its purpose I have no objection to the bill. I will ask the chairman if it goes any further? I suppose it does not go any further.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think not. The bill was before the committee at the last session of Congress, and was reported without amendment. It is a House bill—a very short bill, containing only one section. The Senator will see by running his eye over it how far it goes. The only effect of the bill, as I understand it, is, that where a suit is removed under the law as it exists from a State to the United States court, and the defendant is in custody under the authority of the State court, a writ of habeas corpus may be issued by the Federal court for the purpose of bringing the party into that court. I think that is the extent of the bill, as I recollect it; I have not examined it very carefully this morning. I presume there will be no objection to it. If a case is removed or authorized to be removed, as the law now stands, of course the custody of the party should go along with the case. I do not think there can be any objection to it.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable chairman, I have no doubt, is right as to the extent of the bill. I think I concurred in the committee in reporting in favor of it. It does not enlarge the class of cases which are removed from the State courts to the court of the United States. But the law as it stands now does not provide for what either has happened or may happen, the case of an arrest and confinement under arrest under the authority of the State court. The whole object of this bill is to bring the propriety of those arrests before the United States circuit court, to whom the case itself is to be transferred under the existing law. My friend from Indiana, I think, will concur in the bill if he will look at it carefully. It does nothing more than give the circuit court authority to ascertain whether there is a cause for the arrest or not.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I thought so, and I interposed no objection to the bill with that understanding. That is my impression of it. The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 213) to extend the provisions of the act in regard to agricultural colleges to the State of Tennessee was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

REWARDS TO PRISONERS FOR GOOD CONDUCT.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 460.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 460) in relation to persons imprisoned under sentence for offenses against the laws of the United States.

Mr. HARRIS. The Committee on the Judiciary have reported an amendment to the bill in the nature of a substitute, and I presume it will only be necessary to read the substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The substitute only will be read unless some Senator asks for the reading of the original bill.

The Secretary read the amendment of the committee, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert the following in lieu thereof:

That all prisoners who have been, or shall hereafter be, convicted of any offense against the laws of the United States, and confined in any State prison or penitentiary in execution of the judgment or sentence upon such conviction, who so conduct themselves that no charge for misconduct shall be sustained against them, shall have a deduction of one month in each year made from the term of their sentence, and shall be entitled to their discharge so much the sooner, upon the certificate of the warden or keeper of such prison or penitentiary, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the respective district judges of the several districts of the United States to cause this law to be executed, and to receive and pass upon the evidence authorized by the said State laws, and to give and furnish to the warden or other keeper of the prison the proper certificate, warrant, or authority for the discharge of any convict imprisoned, as aforesaid, upon a conviction under the United States laws, before the expiration of the term of his sentence, or for other mitigation of his punishment, in pursuance of the provisions of the State laws aforesaid, and such convict shall be thereupon discharged from imprisonment or his punishment otherwise mitigated, as the case shall require, in conformity to the said State laws.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

MARYLAND COLLECTION DISTRICTS.

Mr. CRESWELL. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 347) to change certain collection districts in Maryland and Virginia, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and to ask that the bill as amended may be put upon its passage. It will take no time. If it leads to debate I shall not press it to-day.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. The amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce was to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and to insert the following in lieu thereof:

That the districts of Oxford and Vienna in the State of Maryland be, and the same are hereby, abolished, and the office of collector of both said districts is hereby discontinued.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the district of Oxford, in said State, shall be annexed to the district of Baltimore, and all that part of the district of Vienna in said State bordering on the sea-coast, and all the waters which flow into the sea or bays on the east side of said district of Vienna be, and the same are hereby, annexed to the district of Cherry Stone, in the State of Virginia; and that all the residue of said district of Vienna be, and the same is hereby, made a new district, to be called the eastern district; and that the collector of said eastern district shall receive an annual salary of $1,200, and shall reside at Crisfield, which shall be the port of entry for said new district.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the offices of surveyor at Snow Hill and of deputy collector at Annapas set be, and the same are hereby, discontinued, and that the collector of the district of Cherry Stone shall hereafter reside at Accomac Court-House, which shall be the port of entry for the district.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask my friend and colleague if this is reported at the instance of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. CRESWELL. Yes, sir; I have a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury recommending these changes.

Mr. JOHNSON. That will do.

Mr. CRESWELL. The bill has only been changed in some local matters of detail, which from my knowledge of the country I thought I better understood than the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am satisfied.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

WRIT OF HABEAS CORPUS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 605.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 605) to amend an act to establish the judicial courts in the United States, approved September 24, 1789.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the reading of the bill.

The Secretary read it as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. That the several courts of the United States and the several justices and judges of such courts, in addition to the authority already conferred by law, shall have power to grant writs of habeas corpus in all cases where any person may be restrained of his or her liberty in violation of the Constitution or of any treaty or law of the United States; and it shall be lawful for such person so restrained of his or her liberty to apply to either of said justices or judges for a writ of habeas corpus, which application shall be in writing and verified by affidavit, and shall set forth the facts concerning the detention of the party applying, in whose custody he or she is detained, and by virtue of what claim or authority, if known; and the said justice or judge to whom such application shall be made shall forthwith award a writ of habeas corpus, unless it shall appear from the petition itself that the party is not deprived of his or her liberty in contravention of the Constitution or laws of the United States. Said writ shall be directed to the person in whose custody the party is detained, who shall make return of said writ and bring the party before the judge who granted the writ, and certify the true cause of the detention of such person within three days thereafter, unless such person be detained beyond the distance of twenty miles; and if beyond the distance of twenty miles and not above one hundred miles, then within ten days; and if beyond the distance of one hundred miles, then within twenty days. And upon the return of the writ of habeas corpus a day shall be set for the hearing of the cause, not exceeding five days thereafter, unless the party petitioning shall request a longer time. The petitioner may deny any of the material facts set forth in the return, or may allege any fact to show that the detention is in contravention of the Constitution or laws of the United States, which allegations or denials shall be made on oath. The said return may be amended by leave of the court or judge before or after the same is filed, as also may all suggestions made against it, that thereby the material facts may be ascertained. The said court or judge shall proceed in a summary way to determine the facts of the case, by hearing testimony and the arguments of the parties interested; and if it shall appear that the petitioner is deprived of his or her liberty in contravention of the Constitution or laws of the United States, he or she shall forthwith be discharged and set at liberty. And if any person or persons to whom such writ of habeas corpus may be directed shall refuse to obey the same, or shall neglect or refuse to make return, or shall make a false return thereon, in addition to the remedies already given by law, he or they shall be deemed and taken to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction before any court of competent jurisdiction, be punished by fine not exceeding $1,000 and by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by either, according to the nature and aggravation of the case. From the final decision of any judge, justice, or court, inferior to the circuit court, an appeal may be taken to the circuit court of the United States for the district in which said cause is heard, and from the judgment of said circuit court to the Supreme Court of the United States, on such terms and under such regulations and orders, as well for the custody and appearance of the person alleged to be restrained of his or her liberty as for sending up to the appellate tribunal a transcript of the petition, writ of habeas corpus, return thereto, and other proceedings, as may be prescribed by the Supreme Court, or, in default of such, as the judge hearing said cause may prescribe; and pending such proceedings or appeal and until final judgment be rendered therein, and after final judgment of discharge in the same, any proceeding against such person so alleged to be restrained of his or her liberty in any State court, or by or under the authority of any State, for any matter or thing so heard and determined, or in process of being heard and determined, under and by virtue of such writ of habeas corpus, shall be deemed null and void.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That a final judgment or decree in any suit in the highest court of a State in which a decision in the suit could be had, where is drawn in question the validity of a treaty or statute of, or an authority exercised under, the United States, and the decision is against their validity, or where is drawn in question the validity of a statute of or an authority exercised under any State, on the ground of their being repugnant to the Constitution, treaties, or laws of the United States, and the decision is in favor of such their validity, or where any title, right, privilege, or immunity is claimed under the Constitution, or any treaty or statute of or commission held or authority exercised under the United States, and the decision is against the title, right, privilege, or immunity specially set up or claimed by either party under such Constitution, treaty, statute, commission, or authority, may be re-examined and reversed or affirmed in the Supreme Court of the United States, upon a writ of error, the citation being signed by the chief justice, or judge, or chancellor of the court rendering or passing the judgment or decree complained of, or by a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the same manner, and under the same regulations, and the writ shall have the same effect, as if the judgment or decree complained of had been rendered or passed in a court of the United States; and the proceeding upon the reversal shall also be the same, except that the Supreme Court may, at their discretion, proceed to a final decision of the same, and award execution, or remand the same to an inferior court. This act shall not apply to the case of any person who is or may be held in the custody of the military authorities of the United States, charged with any military offense, or with having aided or abetted rebellion against the Government of the United States prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. JOHNSON. The bill itself I have no doubt will commend itself to the approval of the Senate, and I only rise for the purpose of inquiring of the chairman of the committee what will be his construction of the bill or his opinion of the law in the particular which I am about to mention. In my own view, under the law as it now is, any judge of the Supreme Court of the United States has a right to issue a writ of habeas corpus to be executed anywhere within the limits of the United States. This bill professes, according to its terms, to recognize that right, and to make it the duty of the court where it does not appear affirmatively or to the satisfaction of the court that the arrest is not in violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States to issue the writ. A difficulty has arisen in the construction of the present power, and the difficulty will arise if we pass this bill, if it be well founded now.

The former Chief Justice of the United States held that this kind of process issued by any judge of the Supreme Court of the United States could be sent anywhere within the limits of the United States, and would of course be compulsory upon the party to whom it was directed; but an application was made to the present Chief Justice for a writ of habeas corpus to bring before him the case of one of the prisoners at the Tortugas who was charged and convicted of being concerned directly or indirectly with the assassination of the President, by a military commission, upon the ground that military commissions for the trial of citizens, he being a citizen, were unconstitutional, that question having been decided affirmatively by a recent decision of the Supreme Court. The Chief Justice simply denied the application; but, as I understand, he denied it, not upon the ground that the prisoner was there under any proper authority, but because he had no power himself to issue such a writ to be executed outside of his own circuit.

This bill does not cure that defect, if it be a defect; and I suggest to my friend, the chairman of the committee, that perhaps he had better lay it on the table and let us examine the question of law, so as to place it beyond all doubt. There is a practical inconvenience, as we can all see, in authorizing a writ of habeas corpus to be issued by any judge of the United States. This bill gives it to the district judges as well as to the Supreme Court judges; and an application might be made to a district judge in Florida to bring before him some men convicted and sentenced and held under imprisonment in the State of Vermont or in any of the further States. Perhaps it would be as well to limit the authority to the circuit over which the judge's jurisdiction in other respects extended.

I rose merely for the purpose of suggesting to the honorable chairman the doubt which is evidently in the mind of the present Chief Justice of the United States, and the advisability of so framing the law as to remove that doubt.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. Now, if we are about to pass the bill we ought to understand exactly what will be the operation of it. Any man who may be imprisoned in any part of the United States may be brought out by this writ issued by a district judge of the United States farthest from the place of imprisonment. I think that is exceedingly inconvenient, embarrassing, and expensive, and I do not see the necessity for it. I do not see why the authority should not be limited to the circuit judge of the circuit where the party is imprisoned, or at least to the district judges within the same circuit.

The bill would apply, I suppose, to the judges here in this District. They would be authorized to issue a writ of habeas corpus, and it could be sent down to the Tortugas or any where else the farthest from here, either south or north, and the party would be brought here to have his case decided here, and the decision upon that writ of habeas corpus would be conclusive, no matter what might be the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States on the same question brought before them.

I think perhaps the chairman had better let the bill lie on the table until the next session of the Senate, until to-morrow or Monday, so that in the mean time we may look at it and guard against what seems to me to be a very unnecessary measure, and what would be a very expensive one.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall not object to the bill lying over until to-morrow, if the Senator from Maryland desires to examine it further. It was a bill which was called up at the last session and some discussion was had upon it then. There is certainly some force in the suggestion of the Senator, if it be true that the bill is susceptible of such a construction as he puts upon it, that a district judge in one part of the Union might issue a writ of habeas corpus to bring before him a person confined in a remote part of the Union from him. That would be objectionable. It would hardly be tolerated that the district judge of California should issue a writ of habeas corpus to bring before him some person from Maryland. Such, I apprehend, is not the design of the bill, and probably it is not susceptible of that construction; but if the Senator wishes to look into it further I shall not object at all to its going over to to-morrow.

Mr. JOHNSON. I should prefer that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. As it is now one o'clock the special order cuts it off at any rate, I suppose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LOXN, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. No. 99) for the relief of Paul S. Forbes, under his contract with the Navy Department for building and furnishing the steam screw sloop-of-war Idaho, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. No. 112) for the relief of Mrs. Abby Green.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 666) authorizing the Secretary of War to purchase certain property for military purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 820) for the relief of Henry S. Davis;

A bill (H. R. No. 967) for the relief of James Hooper, of Baltimore, Maryland;

A bill (H. R. No. 1044) for the relief of John Gray, a revolutionary soldier;

A bill (H. R. No. 1045) for the relief of Daniel Frederick Bateman, a revolutionary soldier;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 211) for the relief of George W. Lane, superintendent of the branch mint at Denver, Colorado, and Assistant Treasurer of the United States; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 244) to amend existing laws relating to internal revenue.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 755) amendatory of an act to amend an act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus, and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved May 11, 1866; and the enrolled joint resolution (S. No. 156) to provide for the removal of the wreck of the steamship Scotland; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 718) to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move to amend the amendment of the Committee on Finance by striking out lines seventeen to twenty-four, inclusive, of section thirteen, on pages 84 and 85, and inserting in lieu thereof:

On candle or cannel coal, and on all bituminous coal, $1 50 per ton of twenty-eight bushels, eighty pounds to the bushel.

Mr. President, the bill as it stands in those parts of it which the amendment proposes to strike out levies a duty of $1 50 a ton upon bituminous coal brought from a certain region of country, and it levies a duty of only fifty cents upon coal brought from a distance inside of a described line. The Senate will see by looking at the line which is described that the effect of it will be that nearly all the coal that is imported from abroad will be subjected only to the duty of fifty cents, as nearly all the coal which is imported is brought from inside of that line. Now, as I stated the day before yesterday, if that duty alone is imposed upon the bituminous coal, it will very materially injure, if it does not entirely destroy, the use of the bituminous coal of the United States.

The bill, in a line which I do not propose to strike out—for if that interest needed the protection I would vote for it—proposes $1 50 a ton upon anthracite coal. Pennsylvania does not need that protection, there being, as I understand, little if any anthracite coal imported into the United States. It is an article which almost exclusively belongs to Pennsylvania, and is a source of great wealth to her. But the bituminous coal is common to Maryland, common to West Virginia, common to several of the western States, and is very extensively, and must be very extensively, used throughout the United States, for various purposes, for fuel for manufacturing purposes, for the production of gas, for steamboat fuel, and it is becoming a very extensive article of sale and consequently of wealth to the United States. The whole effect of the provision as it stands in the bill will be to protect the manufacturers, who can be supplied by foreign coal this side of the described line, paying a duty only of fifty cents, which will render it impossible for the Maryland miner or the West Virginia miner or the Kentucky miner to compete in the markets with that coal. The whole effect of my amendment, therefore, will be to strike out the distinction, so as to levy a duty of $1 50 per ton upon all bituminous coal; and I hope that, looking to the purpose which we all have in view and the necessity of protecting all, the Senate will concur in the amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The clause which has been inserted by the Committee on Finance here is the same that was inserted by the Committee of Ways and Means in the House when they reported the original bill. It was debated very much in the House, and principally by one of the Representatives from Maryland, taking the same ground that the honorable Senator from Maryland does now, and by a majority of one, I think, though it may have been two or three, the duty was finally carried, as the Senator proposes here. The Representative from Pittsburg gave his assent to it as proper and fair under the circumstances.

Now, there are several reasons why the clause should stand as the Finance Committee arranged it. The Senator from Maryland has made a very general statement that it would destroy the mining interests of the Cumberland valley and of Kentucky if this duty of fifty cents only was imposed. In reply to that I want to say to him that during the existence of the reciprocity treaty, under which coal came in free from Nova Scotia, the whole trade of the Cumberland valley in coal, the peculiar coal they raise there, came up from about nothing to six hundred thousand tons. Although during the operation of that treaty the Nova Scotia coal came in without any duty, the trade in Cumberland coal grew up from a very low figure to about six hundred thousand tons. How can the Senator reconcile that fact, about which there is no dispute, with the idea that the imposition of fifty cents on it, instead of nothing, is to ruin the trade in Cumberland coal? It shows that the honorable Senator has made his statement without being fully acquainted with the data that exist in relation to the matter about which he has made his remarks to the Senate.

Now, sir, does anybody know how much coal is imported from Nova Scotia at this time in the whole? Never over five hundred thousand tons in any one year, and the whole coal trade of the United States exceeds twenty-two millions. Even when the Nova Scotia coal came in free its importation never exceeded five hundred thousand tons. How can that ruin the business in Cumberland coal?

There are several other facts that I wish to mention for the information of the honorable Senator. None of the Nova Scotia coal goes south of Rhode Island to any appreciable extent. It is used principally in New England for the purpose of making gas. All but about eighty thousand tons of it is used for the purpose of making gas, affording the light used by gas companies. Some of the gas companies do not use it, preferring to import their coal from England even at a duty of $1 50 a ton, and do so; but others use it to a great extent. There are only about seventy or eighty thousand tons used for any other purpose than gas-making. It is not used for fuel in families. The anthracite is used almost exclusively for that purpose. The seventy or eighty thousand tons I speak of are used for the purpose of manufacturing iron in the iron rolling-mills established in New England. The Nova Scotia coal cannot be used by blacksmiths, and it is not used by blacksmiths or in machine-shops. It does not answer their purpose; but it is used, as I said before, to that small extent in the manufacture of iron in the rolling-mills in New England.

Now, how will the use of Nova Scotia coal for gas interfere with the Cumberland coal? The Cumberland coal is not used for making gas and cannot be.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is in Baltimore.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir, not the Cumberland coal. I understand it cannot be used for that purpose, and is not. I think the Senator, if he makes proper inquiries, will find that he is mistaken. So it does not interfere with that. It might interfere possibly, but for the large additional freight, with the Westmoreland county coal of Pennsylvania, out of which gas is made, and which is sent down to Philadelphia and other points for that purpose.

Now, let me state another fact of some importance, and that is that the Cumberland coal already has an additional protection of one dollar in the fact that in the same market it always commands a dollar more per ton than the Nova Scotia coal for the very use to which it is put—I mean for use in manufacturing iron. It is a better coal and commands a dollar a ton more, and this added to the gold duty of fifty cents, as the committee propose, would be a protection as it stands now of in fact $1 70 a ton in currency.

Under these circumstances the committee thought that, in view of the large additional duties that are placed upon iron manufactured so largely in Maryland and Pennsylvania, and which fall very heavily upon the workers in iron, it was no very great boon to ask that those who have the coal at their doors precisely where they get their iron should allow the iron-workers elsewhere to import the very small quantity that they use, seventy or eighty thousand tons, free from the additional burden of the increased duty. In Maryland you have your coal and your iron upon the spot. We must carry our coal to Maine and carry our iron to Maine to manufacture it. Now, is not a protection of $1 70 per ton upon the coal sufficient for the Maryland workers in iron and the Maryland owners of coal? It is strange to me that under these circumstances the very small quantity that is used for that purpose and for gas-making purposes cannot be allowed to be imported at the rate of duty now proposed to be stricken out; and such was the opinion of the Committee of Ways and Means of the other House, as well as of the Committee on Finance of the Senate.

The truth is that with reference to all these matters many things are to be considered. The tariff on iron proposed by this bill will bear very heavily upon the population of New England. I think that men should consider in framing a tariff applicable to so many different sections of this great country, having different interests in many particulars, that the rule of "live and let live" might well be applied. It should not be insisted upon by the owners of these large coal mines, whose trade is so very large, that this article, which is mainly used by persons in the United States who were formerly accustomed to get their coal free under the reciprocity treaty, and who have not been able to raise the importation to over five hundred thousand tons, should be subjected to the heavy duties imposed upon other coal.

I have now stated the facts in relation to the matter, and until the Senator can tell me why the Cumberland coal trade grew up from almost nothing to over six hundred thousand tons a year under the reciprocity treaty, when there was no duty on Nova Scotia coal at all, I shall be unable to see how the Cumberland coal trade can be destroyed by a duty of fifty cents, and I cannot consent to vote for this amendment. If he could prove that as a matter of statistics I should be inclined to look with a little more favor on his argument.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member from Maine is always instructive; no one is more conscious of that than I am, because I am almost always instructed by him; but on this occasion he has attempted to instruct me where I think I was instructed before.

I was aware that under the reciprocity treaty coal was admitted free; and I was aware that to a certain extent the Maryland coal was produced and disposed of to a great extent at that time. Whether the amount was four hundred or five hundred or six hundred thousand tons, as he states, I do not know. I suppose he is right as to the amount; but in point of fact the owners of the mines made little or no money.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They sold over six hundred thousand tons.

Mr. JOHNSON. No matter what it was, they made little or no money by it; and they made little or nothing, because the demand for such coal was not equal to what they could have supplied; and the profit upon what they were able to supply was comparatively trifling. Notwithstanding the reciprocity treaty they supplied all the wants of the country with reference to this article this side of New York. That they do now; but that does not furnish a sufficient demand. There have been various companies chartered by Maryland for the purpose of mining coal and bringing it to market. The stock at one time went up to a very large figure beyond its par value, but it soon receded; and there is no one of the original stockholders who held on that has failed to lose.

Having thus, as far as I am able, answered by denying the fact that there was any great value in the trade notwithstanding the reciprocity treaty, my honorable friend will permit me to ask if fifty cents is a sufficient protection for coal brought from this side of the prescribed line, why the committee have charged $1 50 upon coal that is brought from Europe. One would suppose that as it costs a great deal more to bring coal from Liverpool than to bring it from Nova Scotia, if there had been any discrimination between the importation from the two places, it would have been a discrimination in favor of the Liverpool coal. But that is not so; and I might ask him, too, why it is that the Committee charges $1 50 upon anthracite coal; what is the purpose of that? Is that for revenue? That must be answered in the negative, because no anthracite coal is or can be imported; it is not to be found anywhere within reasonable reach. What is it put into the bill for, therefore?

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is stricken out.

Mr. JOHNSON. I speak of the bill as it originally stood. Why was it put in the bill?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will answer by and by.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable members from Pennsylvania can answer that question. It was apparently inserted for the purpose of satisfying what it was supposed might be the wants of the Pennsylvania miner. But why is there a difference now (to ask it in another form) between the duty imposed on coal imported from this side of the prescribed line and that imported from the other side? The only answer that I think can be given is, that the only coal that comes to the United States of this description is that which comes from this side of the prescribed line. Then there is a motive in it; and what is the motive? Is it to encourage the foreign coal owner? Certainly not as against ourselves. It has two objects. It has for its first object, perhaps, the receipt of revenue; but it has for its second and perhaps its more persuasive object the benefit of the manufacturers of the East. I do not complain of protecting them reasonably, but if it be right to protect them by means of a tariff, is it right to do so by sacrificing the interests of other American citizens in their own industry? I do not think any satisfactory answer can be given upon that point.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We deny the fact that it does. The Senator assumes that it sacrifices others.

Mr. JOHNSON. If it does not, and no particular revenue is to be derived from the fifty cents, I should suppose that my friend would have no objection to inserting $1 50 instead of fifty cents, for that, while it would benefit us, would not injure New England.

The honorable member says that the Maryland coal is used only as he understands—of course he has been so informed—in the manufacture of iron.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Oh, no. It is used for a great many other purposes. I said it was not used for gas.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator is mistaken. It is used in the manufacture of gas, and it is not used exclusively in the manufacture of iron.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not say it was used exclusively for that purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON. The iron works in Pennsylvania, which are very extensive, are, I believe, managed entirely, as far as fuel is concerned, with anthracite. They have succeeded in constructing their chimneys and their furnaces in such a way as to make the anthracite answer every purpose of getting a blast which will enable them to ignite it and to burn it just as fast as the Cumberland coal could have been ignited and would have burned out under the original form of their works as far as related to their furnaces. It is used, too, very extensively in the manufacture of gas.

My friend near me [Mr. MORRILL] suggests that they never see the Nova Scotia coal in his neighborhood. I have no doubt that is true; but they never see ours; and they never see ours because they prefer at present prices the anthracite; but if we could carry the Maryland bituminous coal into Maine, where my friend resides, and there be able to sell it at a price anything like the price for which the anthracite coal can be sold, I think they would soon abandon the anthracite perhaps and substitute the bituminous coal. But that is a matter of speculation.

All that I mean to say—and I place the propriety of the amendment upon that ground—is that the maxim to which the honorable chairman of the Finance Committee referred, of living and let live, is perfectly right. No man wants to live by killing another; no man wants to get rich by impoverishing another; no man desires to get rich by keeping another from getting rich within the same time. That is not living and letting live. It is reversing the maxim. Now, what is proposed to be done by the bill as it stands, as I think, lets eastern manufacturers live, but does not let the coal owner live. I think that if we substitute the amendment which I have proposed, instead of having six hundred thousand tons, the production will be doubled or quadrupled, for the supply is inexhaustible. Everybody would be benefited by it. It is not the case now, certainly, in relation to the owners of the mines, who have made little or nothing, although they have gone on from time to time under the hope that they would eventually find it to be a profitable business and benefit everybody.

Mr. CRESWELL. The coal interest in Maryland is one of the largest of our State. I suppose it equals in magnitude any one of the manufacturing interests of New England. In Massachusetts they have some fifty or sixty millions invested in the production of cotton fabrics. In Maryland we have directly invested in coal production $80,000,000. In addition to that, we have invested $18,000,000 in the Chesapeake and Ohio canal and $12,000,000 in the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, making in that State alone invested in the production and transportation of coal a gross capital of $60,000,000.

I know, sir, that many gentlemen consider the article of coal as a raw material; and I believe the very able, energetic, industrious, and upright revenue commissioner, who has had this subject under consideration has treated it from that stand-point. I differ from him, but differ of course with great respect. I admit that coal in the mine is a raw material. In that condition it is worth twenty-five cents per ton only; but when labor is applied and the coal is removed from its bed and placed at the mouth of the mine you find that it is increased in value, according to that gentleman's own statement, about eightfold. Of that increase some seven eighths, or eighty seven per cent., depends upon the value of the labor bestowed upon the article.

In the commissioner's statement he further proceeds to say, that when the coal reaches Baltimore the price of it in 1865 was seven dollars per ton. We then have an increase of twenty-eight fold in the value of the coal at Baltimore, as enhanced by labor and transportation. That almost equals the illustration so often given of the value of labor as exhibited in the manufacture of the main-springs of watches from the raw material. The greater part by far of the value of coal when it reaches the market is chargeable to the labor necessary to its production and the cost of transportation.

But the commissioner in the consideration of this question does not stand precisely in the same position as the committee. He argues it as a free-trader; he says that it is essential that everybody should have cheap coal, and for that reason he recommends the entire abolition of all duties on coal. If his theory be correct, of course there should be no duties on coal coming from any quarter, and it would apply as well to the repeal of the duties on coal coming from England and Wales as that coming from Nova Scotia. But the gentlemen of the Finance Committee do not ask for that.

They incorporate in this bill a somewhat cunningly devised provision—I do not use the term in any offensive sense—applying the rate of fifty cents a ton to coal coming from all sections west of the thirtieth meridian of longitude, and $1 50 to all coal coming from any place east of the thirtieth meridian of longitude. We are then immediately led to inquire, why this singular provision in the bill? Why are gentlemen obliged to go to the globes and maps to ascertain what it means? Why not say at once on its face, "We intend that Nova Scotia coal shall come into New England and wherever else it can reach, for fifty cents a ton, and that all other coals shall be charged $1 50?"

But the chairman of the Committee on Finance says that this coal is only imported into New England. I do not know where he gets that information. I am sure it is a mistake.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I said mainly, not only.

Mr. CRESWELL. I have before me a statement showing the amount of the coal imported during the years 1864, 1865, and 1866, varying somewhat from the statement made by the commissioner, and I think correcting some of the errors into which he has fallen. I admit that it is a very difficult matter to get precise information as to the amount of the product of bituminous coal, and perhaps somewhat difficult to get the precise amount of importations. But, according to the volumes on Commercial Relations, published officially and by authority of the Government, it appears that in 1864 there were imported into New York, free of duty, under the then existing reciprocity treaty, 129,375 tons of coal from Nova Scotia; and in the same year, from Great Britain, 105,924 tons, subject to a duty of $1 25 per ton under the present tariff. In 1865 there were imported into New York 206,649 tons; and in 1866 151,590 tons from Nova Scotia, paying, after the 17th of March of the last-mentioned year, the duty of $1 25 per ton. It thus appears that the statement of the Senator from Maine as to the markets reached by the Nova Scotia coal is incorrect.

The proposition comes very insidiously when presented, as it has been, by the friends of this bill, namely, that all that is asked is that New England shall be supplied from Nova Scotia with two hundred and fifty thousand or two hundred and eighty thousand tons of coal for purposes for which the Cumberland coal cannot be used, and that therefore it is unjust to impose more than a nominal duty. But I will inform the Senator that this is not a fair presentation of the point at issue. I ask him now what was the price of Nova Scotia coal before the repeal of the reciprocity treaty and during the war, when the ordinary avenues of communication and transportation for our coals were obstructed and sometimes actually closed during the rebellion, and when the operators at Pictou and Cape Breton could deliver their coals in Boston for half the price at which it could be sent from the Cumberland mines? If I am not incorrectly informed they charged then up to the full measure of what they could obtain, and they demanded and received in Boston twelve dollars per ton, having the exclusive control of that market.

I hold then, sir, that the same theory will apply to this article as to all others, and that producers of coal will charge as much for it as they can obtain. It is not a question between the consumer and the producer, but it is a question as between the operators of coal mines in Nova Scotia and the operators of coal mines everywhere within the United States. The argument assumes that shape, and we must necessarily occupy that ground in this discussion.

The commissioner, in his statement, asserts that coal from Nova Scotia, during the year 1866, commanded in Boston $8 50 per ton, while that from Cumberland was sold at $8 25 per ton. That, taken in connection with the statement just made by the honorable Senator from Maine, that the Cumberland coal is worth $1 50 more per ton than the Nova Scotia coal, Shows that even in the year just closed, upon their own figures, the Cumberland coal was placed in the market of Boston at a cheaper rate than the coal from Nova Scotia, after deducting the duty of $1 25 on the latter, and that Cumberland coal was sold there at $3 50 per ton less than Nova Scotia coal was sold during the war, when it had almost the exclusive command of the trade.

Now, sir, what is the fact in regard to this Nova Scotia coal trade? Every one knows that it grew up under the operation of the reciprocity treaty. Indeed, the distinguished gentleman from Vermont now occupying a seat in the other House, who has been recently elected to represent that State in this body from the 4th of March next, asserted in public discussion that the reciprocity treaty was originally entered into, not in any expectation of any benefit to the agricultural or the mining or the fishing interests, but solely with a view to the benefits that would inure to the manufacturing interest; that the free-trade policy of England, then recently established, had inspired hopes of a rich harvest to the enterprising capitalists of New England, but that the whole scheme proved abortive, when the Provinces suddenly reversed the policy of the mother country, and as soon as they found they could profit by it imposed heavy duties upon manufactured articles and undertook to manufacture for themselves. The result was that everybody in New England and elsewhere along the boundaries became disgusted with the reciprocity treaty, so far as it affected manufactures. They claimed, however, that the exportation of coal from this country into the western portions of Canada was about equal to the importation from the coal mines which had been opened meanwhile in Nova Scotia under the operation of free trade, and that the coal business was a fair case of reciprocity when in fact there was no reciprocity about it.

We sent into the Provinces anthracite coal, of which they had none, while they sent us in return bituminous coal, of which we had an abundance already.

We care not a straw about the provision in this bill imposing $1 50 duty on anthracite coal. Strike it out, or double it, the result will be the same. We can command the trade of the world in that and ask no favors. There is no region from which any importations of anthracite coal can be made; but it is with regard to the bituminous trade that we have great anxiety. The truth is that when Nova Scotia coals came into this country free they were in competition with all the bituminous interests, and without any equivalent. But at last the Provinces, having refused to receive our manufactures free at the dictation of the manufacturers, we of Maryland rejoiced in the belief that the Provinces could no longer import their coals free into this country. But it seems we were sadly mistaken. During the existence of the reciprocity treaty, in which we acquiesced from a disposition to aid our northern brethren, certain capitalists of Boston, or thereabouts, with perhaps some associates from Maine, went into Nova Scotia, leased the coal-fields of Pictou and Cape Breton, and opened a very profitable trade with our Atlantic border as far south as New York. These speculators who transferred their capital into a foreign country, beyond the reach of all taxation, now turn upon us and say that they will continue their trade and will insist upon bringing their foreign labor and untaxed capital into competition with our domestic labor, charged as it is already with the most grievous burdens. Shall we submit to this?

Sir, I contend that this is not doing as you would have others do to you, that this is not acting in the genuine spirit of protection. I advocate the policy of protection, and I believe that that theory of administering the finances of this Government is correct; I am willing to stand by the producers of woolen and cotton cloths and the manufacturers of iron and every other branch of domestic industry with a view to the protection of American labor everywhere throughout the length and breadth of our land. So believing and so acting, I trust that when I tell gentlemen that upon the coal interest in Maryland, West Virginia, and Pennsylvania, fifty thousand laborers depend entirely for subsistence, it will be conceded that I have a right to claim the same degree of protection for my own people, and the great interests of my State.

It is no answer that even while the reciprocity treaty lasted a trade grew up in Cumberland coal equal to six hundred thousand tons per annum. How did it grow up? Everybody knows that when the trade started, and when it received its impulse, labor could be procured at from seventy-five to eighty per cent. cheaper than now. The country was then unvexed by a depreciated currency, and enterprise was unshackled by taxation. In that state of the case our miners were able to compete successfully with all foreigners, and our production increased steadily notwithstanding the influx of importations free of duty. But now we have to bear not only our own burdens but also our share of the burdens of the Government, and if thus hampered we shall be obliged to enter upon the race of competition with those who are free from all embarrassments we shall certainly fall fainting by the way.

The importation of two hundred and seventy thousand tons of coal into New England is not of itself alarming, but we know from the representations of officials in Nova Scotia and from gentlemen who have invested in the mines in that Province that those mines are capable of a largely increased production. We have two hundred thousand square miles of coal lands in this country; and though gentlemen may seem amazed at the statement made by the commissioner that the United States produced last year twenty-two million tons, I believe that we are capable of producing two hundred million tons per annum. All that we want is a reasonable encouragement in order to increase the product to that amount; I apprehend that when we get two hundred millions of coal per annum we shall have as much as the country wants, and the result will be a decrease in the price.

But in Nova Scotia they are also capable of the same degree of development; and if gentlemen look to this measure as a measure of revenue, they must consider that the seven hundred thousand tons imported in 1865 would, at a duty of $1 50 per ton, yield $1,050,000. If they put the duty down to fifty cents, still regarding it as a revenue measure, there must be three times the importations in order to produce the same amount of revenue. If this rate of duty is established at fifty cents per ton it will not be ten per cent. ad valorem, while gentlemen claim on many manufactured articles from fifty to seventy-five and even one hundred per cent. On coffee, an article of general use and prime necessity, this bill imposes a duty of five cents per pound, which is equivalent to forty per cent. ad valorem. No, sir; this duty of fifty cents per ton has not been fixed for the sake of revenue, but solely for the purpose of inducing an increased production in Nova Scotia; and thus it becomes a battle fairly and squarely between the producer in Nova Scotia and the producer in Maryland, Pennsylvania, and West Virginia; and that is the whole case in a nut-shell.

Now, are gentlemen prepared to say that they will encourage foreign manufactures and foreign labor to the exclusion of domestic manufactures and domestic labor? I trow not. I am sure that Maryland interests cannot survive this policy. We might linger out a sickly existence; but that there would be any more investments with a view to the development of our immense coal-fields I have not the slightest idea. It is now a struggle, with labor as it is, to produce coal and to convey it to market; but if this competition is allowed you will find the Nova Scotia coal not only coming into Boston and New York, but actually driving us to the wall in Philadelphia and Baltimore. All we ask is that there shall be imposed a duty of $1 50 a ton, equal to about twenty or twenty-five per cent. ad valorem, in order to enable us to overcome the natural obstacles in our way to the coast.

It is well known that in Nova Scotia the natural advantages of location are very great over those of Maryland, West Virginia, and Pennsylvania. Our mines are two hundred miles from the sea-board; theirs are within six miles of the sea-board. It costs us about $1 80 per ton to convey our coals from Cumberland to Baltimore, and to place them in position there for shipment to other sea-ports. It costs these Nova Scotia companies but a small fraction of that sum. The difference in that point of transportation alone is such that, with labor at its present high price, they would be able to drive us out of the eastern markets, and that state of affairs would be fraught with ruin.

The commissioner says that it is very important for everybody to have the means of warming and lighting his house at the lowest cost and of cooking his food cheaply; and one gentleman in the other House remarked at the last session—I suppose I may allude to it without impropriety—that it was absolutely necessary that the poor people in New England should have cheap coal, because they were often unable to buy a sufficient amount of cotton and woolen clothing. I think it is quite as important that in Maryland we should have our due proportion of cotton and woolen fabrics. We desire to take them and are willing to buy them from the New England manufacturers rather than from the importers, though we may have to pay a higher price, because we want to encourage the labor of our own country and keep every section of it in a prosperous condition. But let the principle be carried out in good faith, and be applied to all alike, so that the free laborers of Maryland may, equally with their northern brethren, gather the choicest fruits of honorable toil and secure for themselves and their families the comforts and the blessings of life.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I will first answer one or two questions put by the honorable Senator from Maryland on my left, [Mr. JOHNSON.] He asked me why the duty is put so high upon other coal. I tell him it was designed to make a distinction; it was the design of the House to make a distinction, and for very obvious reasons. It is worded in the way it is with reference to lines because of the necessity of resorting to that mode in order to accomplish the purpose. It is necessary to have some other designation than a mere description of the place from which the coal comes. The Committee on Finance are not responsible for that. If Senators choose to call it a contrivance, it was a contrivance of the House committee and not of the Senate committee, and I think a very good one, and the only one that would effect the purpose.

The coal that is imported from Great Britain is a high-priced coal, rather used as an article of luxury than anything else. It is used somewhat for gas, but it is used by some people for burning purposes, because it has peculiar advantages as a burning coal; and those who can afford to pay for it buy it and use it in preference to other coal; and hence it is imported to a certain extent; and as that is a matter of trade with Great Britain, we thought under the circumstances the duty upon it might stand.

Anthracite was mentioned originally simply because it has always stood so in our tariffs. The idea of putting a duty on it, however, is a mere humbug, for none can be imported; and for that reason, when the committee came to see how the matter stood they struck out those words and simply put the duty on "all other coal." Anthracite coal needs no protection of any kind or description.

If the Senator's coal from Cumberland needs protection it needs protection against two enemies: one is anthracite coal, which will be preferred for burning purposes always to the Cumberland or any other bituminous coal in this country wherever it can be had at anything like the same price. That experience has proved. I do not know that a pound of the Nova Scotia coal or Cumberland coal is used for the purpose of fuel merely in the town where I reside, though we import some of the Nova Scotia coal. The other enemy Cumberland coal has to contend with, let me tell the Senator, is the Baltimore and Ohio railroad and the Chesapeake and Ohio canal. Its enemies are the freights the Maryland miners have to pay over their own railroads and their own canals, raising the price of coal. They should fear this much more than any competition from other coals anywhere. The effort is to saddle all the rest of the country with those freights for the benefit of these two works.

Now, sir, with reference to the main question, let me answer one or two of the questions of the Senator on my right, [Mr. CRESWELL.] Cumberland coal sold at a lower price than Pictou coal this very last year in the New York market, with all its expenses of transportation. It sold at something like seven dollars and a half or eight dollars, when the Pictou coal was selling for nine dollars and a half, because it could be put there cheaper. It is sold in New England and used in New England, and used largely in New England, for purposes for which the Pictou coal cannot be used. It is used, in the first place, for purposes of steam. It commands a higher price for that use; and during the war, when Pictou coal was selling in Boston at ten dollars, large quantities of Cumberland coal were selling in Boston at sixteen dollars, for the simple reason that it is used for so many more purposes. In a statement handed to me by a gentleman who is perfectly familiar with the whole matter, he says that in Boston Cumberland coal was selling at about the same price as Pictou, but the real value of the coal was one dollar per ton over Pictou. That was at a later period than the one of which I have just spoken. He says further, that Cumberland coal is used extensively for ocean steamships; all the steamers from New York and Boston use it. Forty pounds of Cumberland will make more steam than fifty-two pounds of Pictou. All the glass-works in New England use Cumberland coal, and it is the only coal used in machine-shops and for blacksmiths' purposes throughout the country. It is carried by rail to Island Pond for blacksmith purposes. It goes up that far, through Maine, very near to Canada, in preference to the Pictou coal.

Mr. CRESWELL. Because it is cheaper?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir; it is because the Pictou coal cannot be used for these purposes; it cannot be used for raising steam, or rather it is so inferior for that use that they can afford to pay a higher price and do pay a higher price, notwithstanding all the cost of transportation, for Cumberland coal. The Pictou is used principally for making gas in New England; and, as I stated before, the only thing besides that which is wanted in reference to the matter is from seventy to one hundred thousand tons, used in the manufacture of iron, in which we compete at such immense disadvantages with Maryland and other iron-producing States that have their iron and coal on the spot.

Mr. CRESWELL. Allow me to ask a question. Will the Senator inform me how it was that during the last years of the war the coal companies in Nova Scotia declared such immense dividends?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know that they did.

Mr. CRESWELL. It is a fact.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am now informed of it for the first time.

Mr. CRESWELL. They declared dividends equal to one hundred and seventy-five per cent. in one case, and varying from that down to twenty per cent., and none lower.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is so easy to make these statements that I should like to know where the Senator gets his authority.

Mr. CRESWELL. I get it from a gentleman who is perhaps as well versed on the subject as the gentleman whose letter the Senator read.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The gentleman whose letter I read is perfectly well known to me, and he is familiar with the coal and iron business and has been for years, and he does not import an ounce of the article or use an ounce of it in any shape or form.

Mr. CRESWELL. The member from the Cumberland district [Mr. THOMAS] made that declaration in the House last year, and asserted it upon his own personal veracity that he had that information as direct as it could be obtained, that he was perfectly satisfied of its truth. He has given this subject more attention perhaps than any gentleman in either branch of Congress.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If I should assert on my own personal veracity all the things that have been stated to me by the most highly respectable gentlemen engaged in the different branches of business, I should undertake to carry a load that would break down any man or any set of men that might attempt it. The fact may be so; but I do not believe it, because the amount of sales would not justify any such statement. The sales are very small.

The Senator appeals, as does every other Senator who has a particular interest in his State to look after, to the principle upon which all our tariff bills are founded as a general principle, namely, the encouragement of our own labor; and he speaks of the high percentage placed upon some kinds of manufactures and the low percentage upon others. If he will look through this bill he will see that there are many things that pay as low as ten per cent., for the reason that they come very near to raw materials, and the policy of the bill is, so far as we can, to let in raw materials without duty.

There is another consideration, and that is a consideration which is somewhat important to us living near the Canadian frontier, with reference to trade. I will not now reply to what was said about the reciprocity treaty and the way in which it was made. I think I know as much about that as does the honorable Representative from Vermont, who is soon to be in the Senate. No man has a more strong personal respect and regard for that gentleman than I have; but I think I know as much about that treaty as he does, inasmuch as I was here when it was adopted and know the principles upon which it was founded, and he was not; and I had very considerable to do with the question. I was in the Senate at the time it was adopted, and I was present at the discussion.

Mr. SUMNER. And spoke.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I spoke upon the subject in the Senate; but I did not vote for the treaty.

Now, sir, in reference to these matters, we in New England feel as if a little something was due to considerations of trade. Our trade with the British Provinces has been of consequence to us. The repeal of the reciprocity treaty and the kind of feeling that is growing up is cutting it up by the roots. I should like to retain some portion of it at least; it is of advantage to us. I have already stated to the Senate that the Committee on Finance, in considering the tariff bill, thought it was a matter of some consequence to retain, if possible, our trade with foreign nations if we could do so without endangering the interests of the country. We think so still; and the more we cut off the receipt of raw materials, coarse materials which we get from the British Provinces, the more we interfere with a trade that is valuable and beneficial to us.

Now, the Senate will permit me to bring a personal matter into consideration; I cannot help mentioning it. I stated the other day, in a few remarks that I made, and I closed the remarks I then made by saying, that it would not do to trust the manufacturer with making a tariff. I will extend that remark and say it would not do to trust the commercial people with making a tariff. It would not do to trust any men exclusively interested in one line with making a tariff. The interests of all must be consulted; and those who are not particularly interested in one branch, I think, should decide the question. Fortunately, I as an individual am not interested in manufactures or in trade or in anything, even in agriculture, except to the extent of about half an acre of land in my garden; and I do not find that very profitable, for I believe every cucumber I raise costs me a quarter of a dollar. So I think I am in a pretty good state to act upon this question, having no great personal interest. But I see that a correspondent of the New York Tribune has undertaken to say that I stated here in debate that it would not do to trust the manufacturers to make a tariff, because they would destroy, or desire to destroy, the commercial interests of the country, or something of that sort. I made no such statement of any kind or description.

Mr. CONNESS. I thought you never noticed what the papers said.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My attention was called to it or I should not have noticed it. I stated what I have just said, and it required a great deal of ingenuity in this correspondent to pick out two different parts of my speech and put them together in that way, and it required not a little coolness to do it when on the same page of the newspaper was the report of the Associated Press which stated correctly what I did say upon the subject, and the Globe stated it more at length; and both statements were to the same effect. It was a very silly misrepresentation as well as a malicious one. However, I have paid all the attention to it that I designed.

I repeat what I said with reference to that point: it is of importance in my judgment that we should retain as much of our foreign trade as we can, if by so doing we are not affecting injuriously other interests, and those which may be considered by some gentlemen more peculiarly the interests of this country.

Now, then, it is perfectly manifest that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. CRESWELL] has argued from his apprehensions. It is utterly impossible that the light duty, comparatively, of fifty cents per ton upon Pictou coal could interfere essentially with Cumberland coal or with any other coal in any way; and to raise that duty to the amount now proposed imposes a heavier burden by increasing the duty upon the few manufacturers of iron there are in New England, and it makes a heavier tax on the light which the people get from the manufacture of gas. Now, cannot the Senator afford that little boon to New England, which is so heavily burdened with reference to these taxes that are put on for the benefit of the iron interest in which his constituents are concerned?

Mr. CRESWELL. We should be glad to grant it if we could afford it; but our charities must be measured by our ability.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is the very point. I contend that it can be afforded, because the interests of one does not interfere with the other, as I have shown, unless the Senator can convince me that we could use the Cumberland coal for the purpose of making gas, and get enough of it.

Mr. CRESWELL. There is plenty of coal in the country to make gas from.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Where will the Senator find it?

Mr. CRESWELL. In the very place the Senator mentioned himself—Westmoreland county, Pennsylvania, and West Virginia.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose you can in Westmoreland county, Pennsylvania, find some; but when you come to put on the freights upon an article so necessary as light for the people—heavy railroad freights such as are imposed by the Baltimore and Ohio railroad and other roads, which make the price of coal so burdensome—it becomes a serious question whether the article will bear such an increase.

But, sir, I do not feel disposed to continue this debate. The matter is one in which my constituents are much interested; but really it is so small that it strikes me it is hardly worth while to insist upon the duty being raised upon this coal. The duty under the existing tariff is $1 25, and the amendment is to make it $1 50. As I said before, at the rate proposed by the committee, fifty cents, the protection is in fact $1 70, because in the first place Cumberland coal is worth one dollar a ton more for any purpose for which it is used, and in the second place the fifty cents duty on gold amounts to nearly seventy cents in currency, bringing it up to what I stated.

Mr. CRESWELL. There is but one remark that fell from the Senator from Maine to which I desire to reply, and that is as to the inordinate charges of the canals and railroads who are the carriers of our coal to market. Our theory on that is precisely the same as it is on all other manufactured articles. Our desire is to have so much coal produced in the country as to make a competition in that article inside of the country, not only as to the production of coal, but also as to the freightage of the coal, so that it may be brought down to the lowest possible figure at which the companies can by transportation make a living. The difficulty with the Baltimore and Ohio railroad and with the Chesapeake and Ohio canal was perhaps more owing to their location than their own fault. During the war they were broken up several times; the Baltimore and Ohio railroad was broken up three times; the Chesapeake and Ohio canal was broken up, boats were burned, the banks were destroyed, the locks were injured. But if these companies have charged inordinately, let other companies be organized for purposes of transportation, and let those companies compete with them and bring the prices down to the lowest figure.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Your State will not organize them.

Mr. CRESWELL. She will organize them if necessary. Maryland is as much interested in having cheap coal as any other State, and we want to have our mines developed to such an extent that the amount produced shall always force a way to market and oblige those who produce coal and who carry coal to do it at the lowest possible figure.

Mr. WILLEY. Mr. President, these clauses of the bill which it is proposed to strike out as they now stand mean, I suppose, if they mean anything, to admit the principle of protection, and the propriety of applying the principle of protection to the production of coal in this country. Both the clauses propose to impose a certain sum per ton upon coal; therefore the necessity, the propriety of giving protection is conceded; the principle is admitted. That being admitted, the next question is, does the bill as it now stands accomplish the purpose proposed by it. If it is necessary to have this principle of protection incorporated in the bill at all, if the principle itself be right, then the question is, how far shall it be applied. Will the insertion of a mere nominal sum in this bill, which does not accomplish the proposed purpose, satisfy the country or satisfy the implied understanding by incorporating this provision in the bill? What is the use of admitting the principle in the bill by imposing a duty unless such duty shall be imposed as accomplishes the purpose proposed by the bill?

It seems to me that the two clauses of the bill are inconsistent with themselves. Coal from one side of a certain geographical line must pay $1 50; coal from within that geographical line is to pay only fifty cents per ton of twenty-eight bushels.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is not a new principle. We impose different duties upon goods directly imported from the East Indies and goods imported from the East Indies by way of Europe. Why do we do it? It has been in our tariffs for a long time.

Mr. WILLEY. I confess, Mr. President, that I am not very familiar with the details of the tariff bills; but has not the Senator got the cart before the horse? Is not the discrimination the other way in the instance mentioned?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The reason simply is that some other interests which are important to the country require it.

Mr. WILLEY. It may be so; but if there be anything in the Senator's point it would be proper for him to show that different interests require the discrimination here. Now, the point to which I was wishing to direct the attention of the Senate was this: if it be necessary to protect this branch of American industry from foreign competition at all, and to impose duty upon the foreign article, where is the propriety of imposing a greater duty upon the same article which comes from a different longitude? If we want to protect domestic industry against the introduction of a foreign article coming in competition with our own article, we fail very much to accomplish it when we impose a high duty upon the distant article, which perhaps would not or could not be so easily brought into competition with our article, and a lower duty upon an article in a foreign country lying nearer our shores.

But then, Mr. President, I fully concur with the Senator from Maine, and with other Senators, that we should have coal, it being an article of general consumption in the country, upon terms as reasonable as possible. I am willing to admit that it enters very largely into the comforts and conveniences and necessities of society. But then, reverting again to the principle incorporated in the bill, that we propose to protect the domestic article and to protect our domestic industry engaged in producing this article, why should we not adopt a proposition which will accomplish that purpose?

But, then, Mr. President, following out the policy of this principle of protection in regard to the production of coal, what would be the probable result? It may be, and I believe it is, the fact that the Cumberland coal is not very valuable as a gas-producing article. The Senator from Maine seems rather to doubt whether we had in this country any very considerable mines producing gas-making coal.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, I do not. I said that in Westmoreland county, Pennsylvania, it existed; and it exists very largely in Ohio. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. WILLEY. It exists very largely in Ohio, very largely in Pennsylvania, and it exists all over West Virginia. Our hills are full of cannel coal with which no other coal can come into competition in the production of gas. Our hills are full of bituminous coal. The gas of this city is made from coal from within nineteen miles of where I live, a large portion of it. Our hills, too, upon recent discoveries are full in some places of asphaltum, albertite, or chap-a-po-te. We have the means of enlightening the world if you will only give us protection enough to enable us to do it. We have fifteen thousand miles of coal-fields, some of our hills developing in different strata as high as seventy feet of workable coal.

Interspersed through all these mines are veins of cannel coal. And we have, besides that, the purest asphaltum in the world—a vertical vein which is a curiosity to all geologists, five feet thick, ascending to the top of the mountains, and descending perhaps two thousand feet, already explored two hundred feet deep, so rich, so near to resin itself that out of it you can produce one hundred and twenty gallons of pure oil to a ton. And yet, sir, in West Virginia we have a terra incognita of these mineral resources, placed as it were almost in the center of the United States, on this side of the Rocky mountains, as yet unexplored, undeveloped, with the Ohio river to carry it southward, wanting means to get to these mines.

These rich resources in our State are attracting the attention of capitalists. Already men have been purchasing up some of these rich mines; already are men investing their capital in constructing railroads from the northwestern branch of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad into the interior to these mines; they are constructing retorts there for the purpose of making oil out of this asphaltum, and reaching our rich mines. What we want is reasonable protection; and if we are to have protection at all, if the principle of this bill is worth anything at all and is to be recognized, give us such protection as will be effective.

This cannel coal, this gas-making coal, is a matter of very great interest to all the country. Besides a great object of the protection of the encouragement of domestic industry is the development of the resources of our country, and thus the increase of the aggregate wealth of the country. All I want is that the principle of this bill may be made practically efficient, that if we are to have protection at all we shall have such reasonable protection as will enable us fairly to compete with the foreign producer. A protection that does not amount to that is no protection at all; it is a mere delusion, and is tantalizing the capital of the country and the domestic industry and labor of the country.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let me say to the Senator that in the imposition of this duty protection was not in view at all, because the committee did not think that our bituminous coal needed any protection whatever against the coal that is imported from Nova Scotia; but a small duty was imposed by way of revenue; it was not made large, for the reason that other interests of the country require that it should not be. That is the simple reason.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I have found myself unable to bring my mind to support a tax upon an article depending altogether upon the longitude from whence it comes; and when this bill was read by the Secretary there was nothing in it that struck me as more singular than the proposition that coal coming from beyond a certain longitude should be taxed $1 50, while coal coming from within that longitude should be taxed fifty cents. If the chairman of the committee would say to us that the coal brought from beyond that line was worth three times as much as the coal that is brought from within that line, then perhaps his argument would have force.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I thought I stated once, and that the Senate understood completely, that the object of the clause was to let in Pictou coal at a low rate; but owing to the condition of our treaties we cannot make a distinction between countries. We can, however, draw a distinction generally, which does not nominally make a difference between one country and another. It is drawn as it is to avoid the operation of treaties which prevent our naming the place. That I understand to be the origin of the clause.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then why not put it all at fifty cents? There is nothing in the treaties to prevent us putting all coals at fifty cents, I suppose, if that is right, if that is the tax that ought to be upon them. Now, I know of no interest that can be protected, if we are to have protection as a purpose of legislation at all, with less hurt to the country than coal. It will make no difference to us in the western States whether the tax upon foreign coals be one dollar or five dollars a ton, for no coal can reach the interior of this country from the sea-coast; and I suppose that the only section that can be affected by this provision is that section that lies upon the Atlantic coast; and it is simply a proposition that they shall have cheap coal from the Provinces coming in immediate competition with the coal interests of our own States. I do not think that is right if we are to have a tariff bill at all like this.

The burden of the argument of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] in support of this bill, who represented the committee in its advocacy, in its protective features, was this: that the volume of our currency is so great that labor is high, and that everything which goes to decide the cost of labor is so high that we cannot compete with the labor of other countries; and he took the position, as I understood, that labor was higher than gold in comparison with former times. Then, sir, if that position be true, ought not the laborer in the mines to be protected from it? If that be true ought not the interests that are invested in coal to be protected upon that proposition, the proposition upon which this whole bill stands as a protective bill?

Another thing: is it right for the manufacturing localities to ask a high tax upon all they produce and then to refuse a similar protection to the laborers in the coal mines? By this bill you add a per cent. to the clothing that the miner purchases from New England. That goes into the cost of labor in the mines. Is it not fair, then, as you talk in this bill so much about compensations, that you shall protect the miner in his labor? You make him pay something more for every article of clothing that he buys, that that protection may go to the benefit of the manufacturer. Is it fair, then, to say that the manufacturer shall have a benefit in this legislation of cheap coal coming in competition with the laborer in our own mines? I do not think it is right; and although I generally vote for the lowest rate of duty that is reasonable and right, I shall vote for a liberal protection to coal in this bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. One word. The Senator has said nothing new, nothing which has not been said half a dozen times before here almost in this very debate, particularly by the Senator from Maryland. The answer I make is simply this: I agree to the idea of protection upon whatever needs it. My idea was founded on the argument that no protection in this case is necessary in point of fact.

Mr. BUCKALEW called for the yeas and nays on the amendment, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 26, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Conness, Cowan, Cragin, Crosswell, Davis, Doolittle, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane, Norton, Ramsey, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Van Winkle, Wade, and Willey—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Dixon, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Foster, Morgan, Morrill, Patterson, Sprague, Sumner, Williams, and Wilson—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Guthrie, Harris, Howard, McDougall, Nesmith, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ross, Stewart, Trumbull, and Yates—12.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out the words "one dollar and fifty cents" in line two hundred and sixty-five of section seven on page 36, and inserting "two dollars;" so as to make the section read:

On planter's hoes, or other hoes, wholly or in part of steel or iron, two dollars per dozen.

In the first place, I wish to say that a duty of $1 50 per dozen to the manufacturer is, as I believe, and as I think I can show, little if at all better with the other provisions of this bill than honest free trade would be; no better than if he made his hoes without any protection and without paying any duties whatever. I wish also to disabuse the minds of Senators, if they have the impression that this is simply a Connecticut interest and that I am desirous of benefiting a mere home interest. It is true some of my constituents are interested in the manufacture of these hoes, but so are other sections. There are manufactories of these hoes in the State of Massachusetts, in the State of New York, in the State of Pennsylvania, and in the State of Ohio; so that I trust I am not advocating a merely sectional interest. Further, I am asking simply that the amount of duty fixed by the bill of the House of Representatives on these articles should be the law. The amendment I propose will only make this bill conform to the House bill on this point.

I said I did not think a duty of $1 50 was any if at all better than real free trade, and I think I can show it. I have taken some pains to inform myself on the subject, and if Senators will attend to me I think I can convince them that this $1 50 duty is really no protection at all.

I differ entirely from the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] who said the other day that at the present time it seemed impossible to make up a tariff bill that would not be protective. It seems to me not only possible, but that it has been actually worked out; that while we get a tariff bill which I admit imposes very high duties, yet they are laid in such a manner, one so countervailing the other, that many interests which seem to have ample protection really have no protection whatever; and worse than that, the proposed legislation in some cases discriminates against home labor and in favor of foreign labor, the duty, nominally, being very high.

The clause as it stands in the bill proposes a duty of $1 50 per dozen on these hoes. They are manufactured of Swedes' iron; and to make a dozen of the average size of these planter's hoes it takes twenty-eight pounds of iron. These twenty-eight pounds of iron, under the present bill, pay a duty of thirty-five cents. It takes, in addition, four pounds of cast-steel, which is imported, and the duty on which is sixteen cents. It takes half a pound of borax, the duty on which is five cents. It takes a pound of emery, the duty on which is two cents. Then there is the wear of the grindstones. Of course you cannot reduce that to an exact figure for a dozen of hoes, as is the case with the other articles I have given; but by an estimate which I believe is accurate five cents is given as the proper proportion of the duty on the grindstones used, those being all imported. Summing up these items we have sixty-three cents as the sum-total of those several duties on the articles which go into the manufacture of a dozen of these hoes.

Then the internal revenue tax on this dozen of hoes, which sell on the average for eight dollars, is forty cents. The sixty-three cents of duties subtracted from the $1 50 protection leaves eighty-seven cents. From that, the internal revenue tax of five per cent. on eight dollars, forty cents, should be deducted, leaving forty-seven cents, and that is the whole protection upon a dozen of hoes, if we stop here. This is not all.

The coal which is consumed in this manufacture it is not possible of course to determine exactly, but we can come pretty nearly to it. An establishment that manufactures fifty dozen of hoes per day, which is a good sized establishment, requires to run its engines three tons of coal, and two tons more for the other necessary uses of the establishment, heating the hoes, &c., making five tons. Five tons per day in an establishment manufacturing fifty dozen of hoes per day would be one ton to ten dozen of hoes, or two hundred and twenty-four pounds per dozen. Then it takes two hundred and twenty-four pounds of coal to make a dozen hoes. Now the cost of two hundred and twenty-four pounds of coal at tide-water, say at New York, is sixty cents, at the rate of six dollars per ton. At Birmingham, in England, the cost of a ton of coal is one third of that, two dollars, and the cost of two hundred and twenty-four pounds necessary for this purpose, twenty cents, making a difference to the American manufacturer on his coal which goes to manufacture a dozen of hoes forty cents. That is the amount paid by the American manufacturer for his coal over and above what is paid by the English manufacturer. We had forty-seven cents left as the protection when this item of coal was taken up, and taking out the forty cents which the American manufacturer pays over the English there is left seven cents, and that is the whole amount of protection given to the American manufacturer on a dozen of hoes that nominally are protected by a duty of $1 50.

This article requires a great amount of labor, and skilled labor, to manufacture. The cost of the labor on the dozen of hoes which sell for eight dollars is between two and three dollars. The cost of manufacturing a dozen hoes is nearly three dollars for the labor alone. Now, a duty of $1 50 on a dozen of planter's hoes, which cost eight dollars per dozen in this country, I admit seems quite a large duty; but when we go into the elements which enter into the cost we find that is not a protection of over seven cents a dozen, instead of $1 50. Five sixths of these planter's hoes are now imported. The other description of hoes are of no consequence to this argument, for they are not imported. I speak of planter's hoes; they are a very different thing from the ordinary hoe used in the northern States.

Under these circumstances I submit that the rate fixed by the House bill—two dollars per dozen—is not too high; on the contrary, it is a bare living protection. The present bill is protective in name, and is intended to be protective in reality; but in consequence of the very high duties on all the materials which go into the production of these hoes the duty amounts to little or no protection at all.

I trust that I shall have the aid of my friend from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] on this subject, for he, as I understand him, is decidedly and strongly in favor of protecting American industry. If I was asking one hundred and sixty per cent. I should of course want a little of his strength of assurance in order that I might ask it gravely from the Senate. I am asking for no such protection. I endeavored, it is true, to keep an article which had one hundred and sixty per cent. protection where it was, without having it raised; but against the power and influence of the Senator from Michigan my effort was unavailing, and instead of one hundred and sixty per cent. the duty was advanced to something over two hundred per cent. Of course I do not complain of that at this time; but I trust the Senate will see that what appears to be protection is made some real protection, and that we shall not be cheated by a name when in reality the legislation discriminates against us instead of for us. I hope there will be no serious objection to the amendment I propose.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Connecticut will certainly have my support for this amendment, and I beg to inform him that in Michigan we are more interested in this manufacture than perhaps the State of Connecticut.

Mr. FOSTER. Then you will not think I am sectional.

Mr. CHANDLER. Not at all. I shall with great pleasure support the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. GRIMES. I ask for the reading of the clause as it will stand if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut be adopted.

The SECRETARY. If amended as proposed, the clause will read:

On planter's or other hoes, wholly or in part of steel or iron, two dollars per dozen.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator from Connecticut gave us a very thorough analysis of the cost of planter's hoes, but he failed to give us any information of the cost of the other kind of hoes, such as are used in the section of the country in which I happen to live.

Mr. FOSTER. I am perfectly willing that my amendment shall apply to planter's hoes only. The other hoes are not imported now, and $1 50 a dozen is unquestionably adequate protection to them; at all events I do not wish to disturb it. It is in regard to planter's hoes, which are really the only ones in question, that my amendment applies.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not know whether they are imported or not; but I am very well aware that if the bill be passed with that amendment it will be made the excuse for putting an additional price upon hoes furnished to the farmers of the country. I trust, therefore, that the Senator will modify his amendment so as to apply it specifically to planters' hoes and not extend it to all other hoes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut why the other hoes are not imported: He says these are the only ones imported.

Mr. FOSTER. Because they are made of different iron, and the manufacture has been so constantly in the hands of the American manufacturer that foreign competition is entirely out of the question now. The manufacture of planters' hoes, however, was entirely broken up during the war. If I mistake not, there were about two hundred and fifty thousand dozen used per annum formerly; but during the war this branch of business, which is a distinct business, entirely different from the manufacture of the common hoe, was broken up altogether, and is now in the hands of foreigners, and without some protection will continue to be in their hands. It is not so, however, in regard to the ordinary hoe of the farmer.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The difference between them is that one, the common hoe that is made here is a very nice product, a product of considerable skilled labor, which has reached such a point that the business here cannot be interfered with. The other is a coarse, rough manufacture. The amount of it is, that that particular kind of hoe as it is made is about the simplest of all iron work, a very simple manufacture indeed, requiring very little skill, as little almost as anything that is made—nothing to be compared with the ordinary hoe.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish I had here a planters' hoe which I have in my room, and the honorable Senator would find that he is mistaken when he calls it a coarse article or one not requiring skill. It is one of the most finished articles I ever saw.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose anybody could make a plausible statement by making out a list of various items entering into the cost of any manufacture, and assuming the wear and tear of the grindstones used in making a dozen hoes to be five cents, and other articles in proportion. A large calculation might be made out in that way. I do not think that the wear of a grind stone in grinding a dozen hoes would be five cents; nor do I think the quantity of coal guessed at is a safe criterion for us to go by. Sir, I have one answer to the Senator: does he know how much these hoes cost on the other side?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Two dollars and a half a dozen. The tax is over fifty per cent. on this very common article.

Mr. FOSTER. I presume the same resort is had in that case as in others to the practice of invoicing goods greatly below the cost. The invoice is one of the last evidences of real value.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There cannot be any fraud in an article of this sort, and there is none. The commissioner informs me that he heard testimony on the subject, and it seemed to him to be grossly unreasonable, upon so simple and plain an article as this was to put the duty so high. To require a duty of over fifty per cent. on the cost of so plain an article as a hoe I think is unreasonable, and therefore I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Finance Committee whether hoes are made abroad and imported?

Mr. FESSENDEN. This kind of hoe is.

Mr. CONNESS. But is it proposed to raise the duty upon this particular kind which is imported?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Connecticut proposes, as I understand, to vary his amendment so as to make it applicable only to these.

Mr. CONNESS. To hoes of the kind which are imported from abroad?

Mr. FOSTER. I said I was perfectly willing that the amendment should apply to planters' hoes only, and I will modify the amendment by proposing to strike out, in line two hundred and sixty-four, the words "on other hoes," and then to insert, after line two hundred and sixty-five, "on all other hoes, made wholly or in part of steel or iron, $1 50 per dozen;" so as to make the provision stand thus:

On planters' hoes, wholly or in part of steel or iron, two dollars per dozen.

On all other hoes, wholly or in part of steel or iron, $1 50 per dozen.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know that there is anybody here to represent the planters, and it may be a little unpopular to undertake to speak in behalf of their interests, but it seems to me that a proposition to impose a tax upon planters' hoes, higher than is imposed upon other hoes, is an unjust discrimination. I understand the honorable Senator from Connecticut to say that in this country the other hoes can be and are manufactured, and that there is no competition from the foreign market. I suppose that about the same ingredients enter into the manufacture of one hoe as of another hoe, though there may be some difference; and I suppose there is. Of course both require labor. If these hoes are such as the Senator represents, I do not know that I ever saw planter's hoes; but if it be a hoe that is made of an excellent article, and is the product of skilled labor, then it seems to me it is very different, so far as the labor is concerned, from the other hoe, and I do not think that this proposition to impose a tariff of two dollars per dozen upon planter's hoes, while a tariff of only $1 50 is imposed upon other hoes, is a reasonable or just distinction to make, and I would rather the clause should stand as it was originally reported by the committee than to see this change made, as though there was an effort here to strike a blow at the interests of the planters, or impose a burden on them which is not imposed on other people.

These planters are men whose circumstances will not allow them to pay any higher tariff than the men who use hoes in the northern States; but on the contrary they are in embarrassed circumstances. The cultivation of cotton in this country is an interest that we are all interested in promoting; and if any class of persons in the United States need cheap instruments of labor, certainly that class is the planters of the South who are engaged in the cultivation of cotton. I presume that the estimate of the Senator is correct. I have no doubt his arithmetic is correct; but I have had enough experience in connection with this tariff bill to know that when you assume, as some of these persons interested in the manufacture of an article do sometimes, that a certain ingredient costs a certain sum, which is altogether an assumption, an imaginary thing, and then proceed with the argument, you can arrive at a very satisfactory conclusion and show any result that you desire to show. But there are very often mistakes in assuming that the value of a certain ingredient is a certain sum. I suppose the honorable Senator has been furnished with this information by persons who are interested in the manufacture of the article. I undertake to say that you may take up any article in this tariff bill that is the product of labor and is made up of materials upon which a tax is imposed, and it is not difficult (if you allow a man to make his own showing and assume the prices to be just what he thinks they are or ought to be) to show that nobody is protected in this bill or that but few persons are protected. And yet when you read the bill everybody is forcibly struck with the high tariff that is imposed upon almost every article.

Mr. FOSTER. The honorable Senator will allow me to say that there is not a single element that I have stated as making up the amount of cost of the manufacture of these hoes which is an estimate of value merely. It is taken from the tariff bill as it stands, so much duty on so many pounds of iron, on so many pounds of steel, on so much borax, on so much emery. There is an estimate in regard to grindstones, and the honorable Senator from Maine thinks I have got that a few cents too high. That item is five cents in the calculation. That is the only estimate there is in the whole. It is not an estimate of value; it is simply what the duty by law will be if this bill passes. There is no opinion about it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suppose there is an opinion expressed as to the amount at any rate of these different ingredients it will take to make a dozen hoes.

Mr. FOSTER. So far as that is concerned it is true.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is no absolute certainty as to that point. You assume it will take so much of one article and so much of another article to make a dozen hoes, and upon that basis I do not pretend to dispute the computation of the honorable Senator; but I say that I know that the committee in more than one case by undertaking to follow computations that were made by persons interested were misled. I have no doubt the statement of the Senator so far as he is concerned is entirely correct.

Mr. CHANDLER. I stated to the Senator from Connecticut a few moments ago that I should support his amendment. I meant the original amendment. I cannot vote for a discrimination against any one particular interest. Michigan is not interested in the manufacture of planters' hoes, but is largely interested in the manufacture of other hoes. I shall vote against the amendment as amended.

I regret exceedingly that the Senator's constituents were so unfortunate as to be oppressed with that extra six cents per hundred pounds on salt, of which we spoke the other day. I was in hopes that the Senator would yield gracefully and think that his people could stand the enormous pressure; but it seems still to weigh upon his mind. I do not see any way that I can aid him out of the difficulty unless the Senate shall reverse its decision.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not asking that the honorable Senator should aid me out of the difficulty. Indeed it is a difficulty of his own creation, not of mine. If he gets along with his difficulties as I with that, happy as he is now I think his happiness will increase. But that is not the point. The honorable Senator from Oregon says there must be some estimate here. There is an estimate that it takes thirty-two pounds of iron and steel to make a dozen of planters' hoes; and that is all the estimate there is in it; and that is based on actual experience in the manufacture.

I can assure the honorable Senator from Iowa that these planters' hoes are very different affairs from the ordinary hoe used by the farmers. Their weight I should think is twice or three times as much as that of the ordinary hoe; and thirty-two pounds of the iron and steel I think is as little as would be sufficient to make a dozen. If, however, there is an error in that estimate, it is all the error there is. Everything else in the statement I presented showing that these manufactures have but seven cents protection from the Government on their manufacture is as certain as the law. If there is any mistake about the law, there is a mistake about this calculation, but not otherwise. The manufacturer of a dozen hoes where a dollar and fifty cents protection is nominally given, has seven cents only. The difference between free trade and this bill is seven cents so far as he is concerned. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. This a matter that affects the agricultural interest directly, though perhaps not very extensively. It seems to me that a tax of $1 50 is enough on a dozen of hoes. The committee have come to that conclusion, and as one representing that interest, I hope the Senate will stand by the committee's report rather than adopt the amendment.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 11, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cowan, Dixon, Foster, Harris, Howe, Morrill, Sprague, Wade, Wiley, and Wilson—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Davis, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Norton, Patterson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Williams—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Buckalew, Cattell, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Doolittle, Fogg, Fowler, Guthrie, Howard, McDougall, Nesmith, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Stewart, and Yates—19.

Mr. FOSTER. I offer another amendment, to come in on the same page at the end of the two hundred and sixty-first line of seventh section. The clause, as it now reads, is:

On pocket-knives and pocket-cutlery of all kinds, fifty-five per cent. ad valorem.

I move to amend the clause by adding to it these words:

And, in addition thereto, on knives and pocket-cutlery valued at two dollars per dozen and less than five dollars per dozen, fifty cents per dozen; on these descriptions valued at five dollars per dozen and over, seventy-five cents per dozen.

The duty as it stands is fifty-five per cent. ad valorem. My amendment proposes to add to that on the description of cutlery which is invoiced or which costs two dollars per dozen and less than five dollars per dozen, fifty cents as a specific duty, and upon those descriptions which are valued at five dollars per dozen or over, seventy-five cents per dozen as a specific duty. The bill from the House has this provision in substance, but not precisely in these terms. It is a specific duty of fifty cents per dozen in addition to the ad valorem duty in the House bill, which is fifty or fifty-five per cent., I have forgotten which. Now, a duty of fifty-five per cent. ad valorem on this description of cutlery is a very small duty. All manufacturers and all merchants are aware that goods imported from abroad, where the duty is an ad valorem duty, are invoiced with reference to saving money in duties, and the frauds that are alleged and believed in relation to foreign invoices have grown familiar to us all. I do not know to what extent they may be true; but no doubt they are true to a very great extent. Goods imported from abroad, paying an ad valorem duty, are no doubt invoiced greatly below the real value. Anywhere from twenty to thirty per cent. would unquestionably be a very low estimate of the amount of difference between the invoice and the actual cost.

Therefore, when this amount of fifty-five per cent., which is ad valorem, comes to be applied to goods thus fraudulently invoiced, the real protection is much less than fifty-five per cent.; probably one half would be a fair estimate; and so one third the duty is avoided by the fraudulent invoicing of the property. The duties on all the articles which enter into the composition of this pocket-cutlery are so greatly increased by this bill that the protection of the former duty of fifty per cent., which I think is the existing rate, is very much diminished, and the duty on this particular manufacture will be less under the new bill than it is under the present law. Now, a specific duty of fifty cents a dozen over and above the ad valorem duty of fifty-five per cent. does not afford as great protection to the manufacturers of these articles as the ordinary rate of protection in this bill. It is less, very much less.

The effect of the protective system upon this kind of manufacture has already worked out the result which the friends of the American system claimed for it to a very great extent. As proof of that I would call the attention of the Senate to a few facts in regard to the cost of American knives and cutlery in New York in 1864 and in 1866 as compared with foreign knives in those years.

American knives in the year 1864 in the city of New York, taking five different grades of knives, had a market value of $2 75 a dozen for one grade; $3 30 a dozen for another; $6 32½ for another; $10 45 for another, and $22 for another. The imported knives of the same grades at the same time were $3 75, $5, $8 17, $12 50, and $23 75, making a difference in favor of American knives of $1 a dozen in one case; $1 70 in another; $1 84½ in another; $2 45 in another; and $1 75 in another. That was in the year 1864.

In 1866, taking the same classes of goods in the New York market, American knives of the same grades were sold at $2 50 per dozen, $3, $5 75, $9 50, and $20; while imported knives of the same grades sold at $2 10, $2 80, $4 35, $7, and $13 80, making a difference in favor of imported knives in one case of 40 cents a dozen, in another of 20 cents; another $1 20; another $2 50, and in another of $6 70; and that is the condition of the market at the present time.

Now, sir, I point to the fact as one creditable to American industry and one that vindicates the system, that under this system, notwithstanding the rise in everything which goes into the manufacture of these commodities, and notwithstanding the rise in labor, these several classes of knives are manufactured in this country at a cheaper rate than they were two years ago by a very considerable sum. It is true that they are now imported at such a rate that under this duty the American manufacturer must stop, notwithstanding he has been manufacturing an article which has been growing cheaper from year to year, because the foreign manufacture is now so much cheaper than his that it must be driven from the market.

Mr. GRIMES. What are you talking about; poor cutlery?

Mr. FOSTER. No; I am talking about cutlery which is classed as pocket-cutlery. It is not by any means a coarse kind of goods or manufacture, but on the contrary it requires skilled labor and is an expensive style of manufacture. I will not go over the suggestions that I have made in respect to the increased cost of the manufacture of these knives. It is perfectly apparent that fifty-five per cent. ad valorem will be no protection. The manufacture of these different articles in this country under that protection, with iron at a hundred per cent. and the increased rates on steel, must stop. I would ask gentlemen on what ground it is that bar iron is taxed one hundred per cent. and the manufactures of iron, and the finest manufactures of iron, are taxed only fifty-five per cent? What is the sense of such legislation? I had supposed that the idea of duties was to protect labor, and that the more labor was mixed with a commodity the higher should be the duty to protect it. That is the principle, if there be any principle in it; but on the ground upon which this bill in this particular seems to go, when the iron comes from the mine and is manufactured into a bar it shall have a duty of one hundred per cent. to protect it; and when that bar of iron is made into steel and from steel into knives, and of course has its value immensely, almost fabulously increased, it shall have a protection of only fifty-five per cent., and this is facetiously called protection to home labor!

I do not believe that fifty-five per cent. is as good for the manufacturer of knives in this country to-day, paying all the duties which he is compelled to pay on the materials which go into his manufacture, as free trade would be, and I think gentlemen will see that it is not, and cannot be, for the materials which go into the manufacture are doubled in price, more than doubled, and the duty upon the manufactured article is slightly increased; and yet this is called protection!

I confess that I shall quite despair of anything in the way of protection to labor if this be done. The country may be very much loaded, may stagger under the burden of high prices, and yet labor be wholly unprotected. It is possible to work out that result. For instance, you may load iron with such an amount of duty that no such protection as fifty-five per cent. on the manufactures of iron will induce men to pursue the business; you must increase the protection, and you may have to raise the duty very high before any profit is made—the price may rise so high that it becomes almost impossible for consumers to make purchases, and yet nobody realizes any profit.

High prices ordinarily suppose that somebody is making a profit; but where the manufacturer of cutlery has got to pay two or three prices for his materials, and has to compete with the foreign article paying a less amount of duty, the home manufacturer makes no profit though he sells at a high price. It will cost the consumer enough, in all conscience; it will cost him three or four times what it ought to cost him; but the home manufacturer will make nothing, because the commodities which he has used have been so overloaded with duties before they entered into the manufacture that it was impossible. I trust, therefore, it will be understood that although prices may be high, immensely high, there is not necessarily in that any protection to labor.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If we discuss the general principles of the tariff bill, and protection to American labor, and the cost of labor on every amendment that is offered to this bill, I think we shall get through about this time next year if we keep in continuous session. I believe this is the third amendment that has been offered to-day, and it is now nearly half past three o'clock; we have been two hours and a half on the bill. I wish to suggest before saying what I have to say, that I have found myself for two successive days without a quorum. I do not know but that it will be so to-day; but I wish to notify the Senate that I shall ask them to remain until we finish the bill this evening. We ought to do it.

Mr. SHERMAN. We had better take a recess.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, I believe Senators can without going out of the building very easily stay the hungry edge of appetite, and the sacrifice is not a very great one to make for the business of the session.

Now, with regard to this particular amendment, I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut how many pounds of steel it takes to make a dozen pocket-knives?

Mr. FOSTER. I am not able to answer. I have not made the calculation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator asks for an additional duty of fifty cents specific and seventy-five cents specific on certain grades of pocket-knives. The reason why the committee did not put a specific duty on them was simply this: that to put a specific duty upon a very large portion of these pocket-knives would necessarily exclude them from the country. They are of German manufacture ordinarily, and very low-priced and used by children. Such knives are not manufactured here in point of fact, and the original cost of them is not probably more than fifty cents a dozen or seventy-five cents a dozen. The result would be that the specific duty would be in excess perhaps of the whole price of the article.

Mr. FOSTER. The amendment does not propose at all to meddle with cutlery that is not invoiced at over two dollars a dozen.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I was stating the reason why the committee thought they had better adopt an ad valorem rate of duty. There is another idea on which this bill is predicated in regard to articles manufactured from iron and steel, and that is to grade the duty somewhat according to the necessary increase upon the materials out of which the article is made. That was the reason I asked the Senator what quantity of steel it took to make a dozen pocket-knives. He says he is unable to answer it, and I am unable to answer it myself; but anybody can see that it is a very small amount. The increased rates of duty on steel could not by any possibility be over two cents on all that is necessary to make a dozen pocket-knives. You should predicate your increase on the amount of material used to make the article, and not upon the fineness of the work. There may be some fine, careful work about it; but having raised the duties on iron and steel, the necessary increase upon all articles manufactured from iron and steel should depend very much upon the amount of revenue imposed upon the quantity required. Anybody can see, as I said before, that that would be the merest trifle in the world; it would amount to very little on a dozen pocket-knives.

In order to meet that we have raised the tariff as we supposed sufficient in proportion as we have raised other things. Under the tariff of 1864 this trade has flourished. I am not aware that there is any complaint that it has been suffering in any degree under that tariff; but now that we propose additional duty on iron and steel, anybody that manufactures anything from iron or steel comes forward and claims, not a corresponding rate of duty, but an enormous rate of duty, without reference to the amount that it takes from the consumers and the amount of the additional duty which the article itself pays in consequence of the increase on iron and steel, which is the smallest amount possible in the very kind of work that we are speaking of.

The committee were of opinion that as the business itself did not suffer, as there was no pretense that it had suffered, but as it appeared to be doing well enough we would impose an additional duty of five per cent. which is ample to cover the increase on the articles out of which a knife is manufactured. Now, to put fifty cents a dozen or seventy-five cents a dozen on these knives, according to their value, is not a large increase of duty upon the higher-priced ones. As you go up in price the duty becomes proportionately smaller, whereas as you go up in price the ad valorem duty is larger and larger. Under the ad valorem duty as proposed by the committee the best kind is the most protected, as perhaps it should be, and by the increase of five per cent. which we have given throughout we supposed we accomplished the purpose. It is, however, for the Senate to judge.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILLEY. I move to amend the bill by striking out in line thirty-two of section twelve, on page 85, "fifty cents" and inserting "five dollars;" and I desire to attract the attention of the Senate to a paper which has been laid on the desk of every Senator, I believe, this morning, containing a fair statement of the facts upon which I predicate this motion.

According to the tariff of 1862-63, the duty upon chap-a-po-te, asphaltum, and albertite was three cents per pound, or $67 20 per ton. Under the existing tariff law the duty is twenty-five per cent. ad valorem. Why it is now proposed to be reduced to fifty cents a ton I am not able to understand. If Senators will turn to this paper they will see that—

"Chap-a-po-te and Albertite are both a species of asphaltum. Chap-a-po-te is brought from Cuba. Extensive arrangements are now being made by companies recently formed in Cuba for the express purpose of shipping large quantities of the mineral to the United States, to be converted into oil. The expense of conversion is about six dollars per ton, and the yield of oil per ton is about one hundred and twenty gallons."

There is also Albertite in Nova Scotia. I understand that a company, consisting chiefly of foreigners, is organized there, who own the mine and are making arrangements to transport the material when mined from Nova Scotia to within the jurisdiction of the United States, and erect their retorts here for manufacturing oil. The product of oil from one ton of Albertite amounts to seventy dollars, less waste and the cost of refining. This mineral is mined where labor is one dollar a day in gold, and it can be brought to Portland for $2 50 a ton. It is to this statement in the paper on Senators' desks that I especially invite attention:

"One special advantage which the manufacturers of oil from Albertite and other imported asphaltums have in the market arises from the fact that the internal revenue law, with the view to protect the manufacturers of oil retorted from coal and other bituminous substances, (mostly yielding only twenty to forty gallons per ton,) discriminates in favor of oil so manufactured by imposing a tax upon it when refined of only fifteen cents per gallon, while petroleum oil refined is subjected to a tax of twenty cents per gallon. Albertite and other asphaltum oils being made from bituminous substances, when refined, come in under the minimum rate of fifteen cents per gallon; that is to say, one hundred gallons of oil made from Albertite asphaltum (being the product of one ton of the mineral) pays an internal revenue tax, when refined, of fifteen dollars, while one hundred gallons of petroleum refined pays a tax of twenty dollars. Crude petroleum at the wells is only worth at this time about eight cents per gallon, thus the discrimination made by the internal revenue tax in favor of the Albertite and against petroleum of five cents per gallon is equal to seventy-five per cent. on the value of the petroleum at the wells."

Now, sir, it is perhaps not known that we have asphaltum within the United States. One deposit is in West Virginia: it is the most remarkable deposit, perhaps, in the world: it is vertical. As I said a while ago it has been explored from the face of the hill, where it makes its appearance, to its summit; it has been explored two hundred feet in depth; it is five feet in width. It is almost equal to resin in the production of oil. If Senators have any curiosity I have some small specimens of it here, so that they will see that it is almost like resin, it is so rich in the production of oil. I also have specimens of the article from Nova Scotia which Senators will see are identical in appearance, and understand identical in quality, the same thing precisely.

What the extent of this extraordinary deposit in West Virginia may be laterally we do not know. Already the cities of the Union in various quarters are interested in the development of this extraordinary deposit. A small per cent. of it added to ordinary gas-coal brings it up to a very good standard; and there is a desire in various cities and various parts of the Union that this extraordinary mine may be developed for the single purpose, if for no other, of getting a per cent. of it to mix with their ordinary coal for the purpose of manufacturing gas. It has attracted the attention of capitalists; it is now owned by men in New York largely, by men also in Baltimore and from various sections of the country, who are at this moment constructing fourteen miles of railroad from the northwestern branch of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad to this deposit. They are investing a large amount of capital in it.

It runs out also into the region of our canal coal. It is approaching in direction also the oil wells in our State; and other companies and other capitalists are already projecting improvements to connect with these, so that if there be any encouragement by protection of the development of this article in West Virginia it will bring into requisition a vast amount of most valuable minerals in which the country at large is greatly interested. Unless there be some protection to these men who have invested their capital, as I have stated, this development cannot take place. They are placed at a disadvantage growing out of the distinction between the duty imposed upon refined petroleum oil and oil expressed out of this stone, so that they may transport it across the narrow channel, and thus avoid the duty. We get the advantage of this discrimination in the duty.

Now, sir, the canal coal interests in our section of the country are largely interested in protection. Since we are disposed to protect our domestic industry, disposed to protect our domestic manufactures, and thus adopt a policy which would lead to the development of the country, and ultimately, as in the instance mentioned by the Senator from Connecticut just now, result in reducing the price of this article, which must necessarily enter very largely into the consumption of the country in gas and otherwise, I should be sorry to see protection refused in this direction in favor of the foreign manufacturer.

We have the article within our own limits; and certainly if in 1862-63 Congress thought it was proper to extend such extraordinary protection as sixty-seven dollars a ton to this article, the prayer of those whom I represent here in asking for a moderate protection of five dollars per ton now ought not to be deemed extravagant. I trust the Senate and especially do I trust that the chairman of the Committee on Finance will receive this proposition favorably. I think there is merit in it; our own domestic industries, our own capitalists here at home, and our own minerals should have the benefit of this protection against the foreign manufacturers.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think this is literally running the doctrine of protecting American labor into the ground and running it very deep into the ground, now into a mountain in West Virginia, that somebody has bought there with a view to a large speculation, but which is hardly begun to be developed as yet. What does the Senator from West Virginia ask? Because this mountain is in his State and may in process of time be developed, and because a company of gentlemen of New York, speculators, very excellent gentlemen I have no doubt, have invested money there and mean to build a railroad in time, we should at once tax everybody that uses a pound of cement, everybody who uses anything of this quality for his roofing throughout the country; and, moreover, shut up all the factories in New England where oil is manufactured out of this coal. Why, sir, one factory in my own town pays to the Government every year I think something like fifty or sixty thousand dollars of internal revenue. The Senator would shut up all these factories and impose a very heavy duty upon the coal and everything they use because this undeveloped region exists in West Virginia, which with a proper attention to the American system may in time be developed. I think it is unreasonable, and the mere statement of the case as the Senator has presented it shows the great impropriety of attempting to do any such thing. I despair of stopping any movement that shall be made if this be successful. The same thing came before the committee and we did not regard it.

Mr. WILLEY. I have no desire to wholly exclude this competition. All I desire is that the same principle shall be applied to this coal that we applied to merely bituminous coal awhile ago, and that we are applying to every other article of American industry and development. All that I ask is that industry and capital in this direction shall have the same protection that capital and industry in other directions have; that in developing our coal which we happen to have in West Virginia we shall have the same protection that manufacturers have in other sections of the Union; that is to say, that our capital and industry shall be brought into a fair competition with foreign industry; and if we are to have protection given to any one thing it seems to me we might as well have the same protection in this direction. I am asking for no exclusion; I am only asking for a reasonable protection, that kind of protection which has been extended all through this bill to every other article in it, that and no more. If the amount I ask is extravagant, let the Senate reduce it to what would be right. But if it was right in 1862 and 1863 to have a duty of sixty-seven dollars a ton on this article, are we extravagant when we only ask five dollars a ton now? The existing tariff is twenty-five per cent. ad valorem, and if you look to the value of the article you will find that that amounts to five dollars a ton or about that. I only want this bill to stand upon the principles of fair play, that we shall have the same protection in this as in other directions. I do not want to ask anything of the Senator from Maine or of any other Senator that is unreasonable or unfair.

Mr. CHANDLER. I believe that this asphaltum deposit in West Virginia is a very rich one. I am informed that it yields a hundred and twenty gallons of oil to the ton. It is nearly as pure as resin. The Senate has this morning deliberately placed a duty of $1 50 a ton upon coal. The purest of coal yields from twenty to forty gallons of oil to the ton. This yields one hundred and twenty gallons. I do not think the Senator from West Virginia asks an unreasonable protection when he asks five dollars upon this pure substance that is found in such vast quantities in his own State. I believe the mine in West Virginia is the only one to be found in the United States; I have heard of no other having yet been discovered. They are now building a railroad to that mine. I was informed by a gentleman the other day that they were investing several hundred thousand dollars, and in a very short time the oil would be produced in unlimited quantities. I really think the Senator from West Virginia makes but a fair demand when he asks for the small duty of five dollars a ton on this rich deposit.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If that deposit is so rich as it is said to be, what prevents these gentlemen from setting up their factories close along side of it and working it? Nothing can come in competition with it, surely. If it is so rich, richer than anything on the face of the earth, why do they not set up their factories and begin to make it? Instead of that, before they have done a thing they ask the country to impose a duty upon every pound of cement that is used, everything that is used for roofing purposes, and everything that is made into oil, and to shut up the factories for the benefit of some unknown future. Now, let the Senator's friends who have investments in West Virginia undertake to do their work in the first place and show what can be done before they ask us to lay this enormous tax on the country.

I stated in the beginning that I do not hold to the doctrine of protection so far as this, that on a mere experiment we are to begin by laying heavy duties which tax the consumer very much until the production had become an object of interest and advanced so far that we can see what its benefit is. If we do that we shall not only get no revenue from customs, but we shall stop our internal revenue by putting an end to the factories now existing.

Mr. CHANDLER. There are a great many interests that this comes in direct competition with. There is not a manufacturer of lard-oil that is not interested in this kind of protection.

Mr. CONNESS. That is where you come in. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHANDLER. No, sir; the State of Michigan does not produce lard-oil at all. I do not think there is a gallon of it produced there; but there are many manufacturers of oil from coal and other substances, and they are all interested in this protection. I hope the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia will be adopted.

Mr. SHERMAN. When this subject was under consideration in the committee my attention was not called to it, and I supposed that this chap-a-po-te, or asphaltum, bitumen, &c., was a very coarse material worth less than coal. I am now informed that the present duty of twenty-five per cent. is at least equal to five dollars per ton. On that point, if my friend from Maine has any information, I would like to have him give it. The present duty it seems does not operate injuriously to the interest or to the manufacture of oil.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The present duty is twenty-five per cent. ad valorem. I do not know what that would amount to per ton.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am told that the present rate of duty is at least five dollars a ton, at twenty-five per cent. ad valorem. If that is so, I do not see any occasion for reducing it. It is a very proper source of revenue. The business is prosperous if it yields anything like what is said, if a ton of this product yields one hundred gallons of oil. This same bill levies a tax of I think twenty or forty cents a gallon on the oil extracted from the bitumen—

Mr. VAN WINKLE. Ten cents on the erude.

Mr. SHERMAN. And forty cents on the fine; so that it can very well bear a tax of five dollars a ton; and if five dollars a ton is not an increase of the present rate I shall vote for it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We do not know what it would be.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am informed from the best information I can get—

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is now twenty-five per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. SHERMAN. But I am informed that twenty-five per cent. is not more than five dollars a ton. If so, we had better make the duty specific and keep it at about its present rate. I certainly would not vote to reduce the duty, and when it was proposed to substitute fifty cents per ton for twenty-five per cent. ad valorem I supposed it was continuing the old rate, only making it specific; but if that be a mistake, as a matter of course we ought to continue the duty at about its present rate, making it specific. According to my present judgment I should vote for it at five dollars. The House have continued the old rate, twenty-five per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Why should any heavier duty be levied on this than other kinds of coal?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is more expensive than coal. That is the information I have. I know nothing about the article myself, but I am informed that it is much more valuable than coal. The Alberfite is worth three times as much as coal, and if it is worth three times as much it ought to pay about the same rate ad valorem that coal does, because that is the article with which it is brought in competition; and if five dollars a ton is equivalent to twenty-five per cent. ad valorem, that is about a fair rate. The information I get is that it is worth twenty dollars a ton.

Mr. HOWE. The way the case seems to be put is, that it is introducing a material which is equal to the production of one hundred gallons of oil at a duty of fifty cents; that is, half a cent a gallon. It seems to me if our object in this bill is to raise revenue, that is making very slow progress toward it. I do not see why this oil cannot afford to pay as much duty as other oil.

Mr. WILLEY. The question, it strikes me, presents itself in this shape: if it will lead to the development of this rich mine in West Virginia, as it will no doubt, and to the manufacture of oil to impose these rates, which are about equal to those now existing, under which the manufacturers of this article in the North have been able to live along and still pay a revenue to the Government, we can still get that revenue without diminution and increase our revenues by developing this great interest of the manufacture of oil and by the duties upon it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The question is, this: whether gentlemen wish to encourage manufactures. There are many things that are manufactured out of this article, of which it is a raw material, and the raw material is not yet developed in West Virginia at all.

Mr. WILLEY. As the Senator seems to allude to that, I will state that the company are now erecting retorts at this point for the purpose of manufacturing the oil, and are building a railroad from the northwestern branch of the Baltimore and Ohio road, and expect to manufacture largely at that point, and also to manufacture it at Baltimore.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Well, Mr. President, I really cannot understand the process upon which gentlemen act on this subject. Here is an undeveloped mine, if you please, out of which the owners expect to make a large profit some day or other; and in the mean time, not having developed it, not having the raw material at all, not having begun even, except by building a railroad to get to it, they ask in advance that industries that have grown up out of the raw material imported from abroad, which they have not at this time, shall suffer for their prospective benefit. That is just the amount of it. That is the question. I think that is cutting pretty deep. I cannot go for this doctrine of protection to the extent to which gentlemen wish to carry it. I have no doubt if it shall be found in time that this coal, or whatever you please to call it, and it is for the ordinary uses of coal, merely used for the manufacture of coal, comes in competition with what shall turn out to be a great American interest, that at that time something will be done with regard to it to equalize the matter; but to do it in advance and to stop the works which are already going on upon the foreign raw material seems to me to be a very singular kind of proceeding.

Mr. WILLEY. The Senator will allow me to say that the specific duty which I propose is about the same as that now existing. The other article to which he alludes seems to have prospered to the extent he mentions with that duty upon it. I do not understand, therefore, the point of the Senator's remarks. We do not propose materially to increase the duty, if any at all, from what it now is. Our object is to prevent it from being reduced down to nothing, or to fifty cents a ton. It is twenty-five per cent. ad valorem now. Under the existing duty that interest has flourished, as the Senator from Maine says, at Portland by the importation of the article from Nova Scotia and the manufacture of it here, thereby avoiding as you will see the five cents discrimination on every gallon of the oil under the provision of our revenue laws now, which imposes a higher duty on refined oil made out of petroleum than on that made out of canal coal and other substances. In order to get the benefit of that discrimination, they send the crude material over to this country at $2 50 a ton or somewhere thereabouts, manufacture the oil, and then sell it for five cents less revenue duty upon a gallon than there is imposed upon the petroleum oil when refined, and in that way evade the duty and realize the handsome profit of five cents a gallon.

But, sir, that is not the point. The point here is, that we have already expended in making arrangements for the manufacture of this article; indeed we manufacture to some extent already in West Virginia from canal coal and otherwise; but in regard to this asphaltum we have expended large amounts and are erecting retorts now to go into the manufacture immediately; and if the Nova Scotia article can live under a duty of twenty-five per cent. ad valorem, certainly I think it can live with a specific duty, amounting to about the same thing, of five dollars a ton.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The committee have gone upon the principle in this bill, wherever they could, to reduce to the lowest practicable point the duty on the raw material for the purpose of encouraging established manufactures. It is not applied to this article alone, but to many other articles where the manufactures are established and progressing in this country. It was thought to be a part of the American system to encourage these manufactures. Gentlemen have been willing to apply it in a great many cases where they felt that interest with regard to their own sections; but now they wish to reverse it and overturn the manufactures for the benefit of the possible raw material that may be found hereafter. That is the argument. The Senator says that this duty is lower than it is upon petroleum. The reason is it costs much more to manufacture it, and the rate of duty upon the manufacturers of oil and the refiners of petroleum, and of this substance was fixed by agreement and compromise between the parties themselves as to what was right and just between them, and there have been no complaints from them. This business has not been prosperous. The works near my city have failed once. Senators talk about these great advantages, and yet they have had a very hard struggle to get along any how; and now the proposition is that they shall not have the benefit of the principle introduced into the tariff in regard to all other manufactures depending on raw material coming in from abroad.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY.) The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. WILLEY called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. HOWE. I may be mistaken in the vote I am going to give. I am going to vote for this amendment, but without the slightest regard to the protection that is asked for this West Virginia mine. I do not understand that the law or the duty of protection has anything to do with a mine. All the protection that can be asked for, if any, is the difference between what it costs to take out from the deposit the raw material in this country and in any other country where there is a like deposit competing with it. That is all that protection has anything to do with. If you put duties beyond that point upon any such material it is value added to the article; it is not protection; but the people tax themselves to give an extraordinary value to that deposit; so that I do not vote upon the principle of protecting the West Virginia mine. But I cannot understand for my life, and nobody has told me yet, although I made an humble petition for it once, why this material, if it is capable of producing so much oil to the ton, cannot afford to pay a heavier duty than half a cent a gallon.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is the material that comes from West Virginia.

Mr. HOWE. I have not understood that there was any difference between the two materials. Then, on the other hand, it is said that this article is already paying now what is equivalent to five dollars a ton. I have not heard that disputed yet. I saw a paper here which states that but a few years since—

Mr. SHERMAN. Allow me a word. Since I have spoken on this subject I have got a little further information from about the only source of information we have—the special commissioner of revenue—and it is no doubt reliable. He says the Albertite—that is the most expensive—is worth more than twenty dollars, but shale, &c., the coarser produce, would be worth under fifteen dollars; so that I suppose about twenty dollars is the average.

Mr. HOWE. Very well; that would make this tax about twenty-five per cent. But it is said that a few years since this same article paid sixty-seven dollars a ton. I have not heard any explanation why that very extravagant duty was placed upon it then; but for mere purposes of revenue and guided by mere revenue considerations I do not understand why this should not be.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let me say to the Senator that that is an entire mistake. It came in free, the whole of it, up to a year ago, when the reciprocity treaty ceased to operate; and when the reciprocity ceased to operate, then it came under the general provision which was not made for that but for other articles exported from other countries, of the same description. There was no duty on it whatever, and this duty that fell upon it in the course of the year, upon the repeal of the reciprocity treaty, is what has made it operate so enormously upon everybody that manufactured anything out of it. It was free entirely before that.

Mr. HOWE. Then this statement that that very large duty was levied upon it seems to be incorrect.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly.

Mr. HOWE. But there is no mistake about the other proposition, that what is equivalent to five dollars a ton is levied on it now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Undoubtedly, because it came under the existing tariff, which was not made for this particularly.

Mr. HOWE. I do not suppose it was made for this special article, but it pays that duty now, and we are asked to reduce it in the interest of a single factory.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Oh, no; there are more than one.

Mr. HOWE. I have heard but one factory spoken of. But, in the interest of the mere business of manufacturing or turning it into oil we are asked to reduce the duty from five dollars to fifty cents, and to yield up so much revenue. That is encouraging manufacturers rather too extensively, I think. I am just as fond of them as anybody else, and would do just as much for them; but it seems to me that is asking a little too much. I vote, therefore, for this amendment for the purpose of increasing the revenue. I have seen no evidence yet that the business of manufacturing will suffer if we continue that duty. They can still import it. I shall have to pay my part of the duty, I suppose, if I use the oil. Those who do use it will have to pay, as they pay all these taxes.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 20, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Creswell, Davis, Fowler, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane, Norton, Patterson, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Van Winkle, Wade, and Willey—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Conness, Dixon, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Morgan, Morrill, Poland, Sumner, Trumbull, Williams, and Wilson—17.

ADJUTANT—Messrs. Cattell, Cowan, Cragin, Doolittle, Guthrie, Kirkwood, McDougall, Nesmith, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, and Yates—15.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move to amend the bill on page 37, section seven, line two hundred and ninety-three, by striking out "forty-five" and inserting "sixty-five," and by adding at the end of the clause the following proviso:

Provided, That all material contracted for in good faith before January 1, 1867, shall be admitted at the rate of duty provided for by law at the date of said contract.

So that the clause will read:

On all machinery not herein otherwise provided for, composed in part of iron or steel, or of any other metal or material, complete or in parts, sixty-five per cent. ad valorem: Provided, That all material contracted for in good faith before January 1, 1867, shall be admitted at the rate of duty provided for by law at the date of said contract.

The proposition is to increase the rate of duty on machinery from forty-five to sixty-five per cent., an increase of twenty per cent. Commissioner Wells says, in his report:

"Of the machinery designed for the numerous manufacturing now in process of construction, especially those for the manufacture of cotton, and for the refining of sugar, a very large proportion—fully one half in quantity and value—will be of foreign construction, the price being one third less than that for which the same can be contracted for in the United States."

Again, in another portion of his report, he says:

"The commissioner estimates the value of machinery for American manufacturing establishments, now in the course of construction in Europe, at about three million dollars."

The commissioner also states that machinery constructed in this country now costs one hundred per cent. more than at the beginning of the war; that $50,000 worth of machinery before the war would produce as much cotton or woolen fabrics as $100,000 invested now in machinery for cotton or woolen or any other of the varieties of manufacture.

I am aware, Mr. President, that by this amendment it renders it difficult for the American manufacturer to purchase machinery. He will not dare to make a permanent investment at rates so high; but I am also aware that if he does purchase it, by the character of this bill he will not long be able to run his machinery. He has now shut down a large portion of his machinery, and the balance but lingers, and the blow that is now aimed at it cannot but be one of death. The increase of prices of iron and steel and wool, with no increase for the manufactured articles, or but very little, into which these articles are introduced, must show conclusively that, having staggered these interests in the past, the future must see their death. I speak of cotton, of linen, and of everything that comes out of iron and steel that has not received an increased rate of duty.

Did I hesitate a moment to advocate greater protection to this interest I should be doing great injustice to myself. By excessive taxation it has been destroyed, and by a premium greater than heretofore, now offered to the British manufacturer for the introduction of his machinery, the American manufacturer is kept prostrate. There is not one branch of manufacturing product but he can supply did he but know it, did he but cater to our ideas of form and plan. Many of them are already on this scent; many more will follow, until all our manufacturing industry will be done by Englishmen.

He cannot carry on manufacturing without the machine shop. He is by the provision of this bill, as I will demonstrate, driven clear out of this country. While communities are to-day offering large sums of money to induce manufacturing development among them, the Senate, led by Wells, is driving them out of the country. The English offer the largest sum and the American community the least.

Let me read a statement of one of the best manufacturers of machinery:

"The present and proposed tariff bears heavily upon and discriminates against the machinist. The proposed duty on iron used by us, which, with steel, is the main element of machines, is from seventy to one hundred and fifty per cent. ad valorem, being from twenty-eight to sixty dollars per ton. The duty proposed on steel varies from sixty-seven per cent. ad valorem, upward, while the duty on machinery composed of iron and steel, in the reported bill, is but forty-five per cent. Thus the proposed law discriminates against our own machinists and in favor of foreign labor; for it says to the importer that if he will have his labor done in a foreign land, the material and labor together may be admitted for less than half the rate of the raw material.

"The following table shows the cost of cotton machinery at home and abroad, per spindle, and the duty required to compete with England:

The above table is on the supposition that gold and currency are equal; but if gold be reckoned at $1 35, and the price of the raw material enhanced by the proposed increase of duty, and the duty of sixty-five per cent. be put on machinery, even then at gold prices the coarsest slubber above-named can be imported for less than cost to the maker here by three dollars per spindle, and so of the others in proportion."

To illustrate this in a plainer point of view, take the case of a spindle disconnected from the machine. A steel spindle weighs nine pounds, which, at four and a half cents a pound, pays forty and a half cents. Ten per cent. ad valorem at eight cents per pound makes forty-eight and a half cents. The same spindle costs in England one dollar all finished. The duty on that would be forty-five per cent. with no fraud practiced by undervaluation, making forty-five cents; so that the proposed tax on machinery of steel is less than the tax on the raw material by three and a half cents. It is evident that forty-five per cent. will give to the English manufacturer the business of manufacturing machinery for this country; though I do not believe, as I said before, we shall long have any use for it. The present duty of thirty-five per cent. has heretofore given the manufacturing of machinery to England, as Commissioner Wells says England can build cotton and sugar machinery for one third less than our own mechanics, and $3,000,000 worth are now in course of construction. Those $3,000,000 in gold at rates of contract, such contract being based at two and one third here as to one in England, would carry the sum in currency up to $7,000,000. The mechanics of the United States here lose $7,000,000 of work, four fifths being for labor, $5,600,000, which would otherwise go into the hands of our mechanics and enable them to live and to purchase the means of living in their own country. This is from cotton machinery alone.

Why is this so? Because their labor is so burdened by taxes and the raw material being affected likewise, first from similar causes, and maintained in that condition by a duty of from seventy to one hundred and fifty per cent. as proposed by this bill, sixty-five to seventy by the present law, so that the labor of the mechanic cannot live one moment in competition with the untaxed mechanical labor abroad.

Iron and steel are raw materials as applied to the production of machinery, but they are manufacturing products, and those products obtain a protection of from seventy to one hundred and fifty per cent., and the kind of manufactures under consideration and which it is expected will consume the product thus protected, has a duty of forty-five per cent. imposed upon it. What a fallacy! Who is so foolish, who so absurd as to on the one hand enhance the value of one product, and at the same time render another product valueless? In order to continue a value to the one you must assure it to the other. Where are you to find a market for your iron and steel or wool if you admit into the country products made from those articles at a lower rate of duty than the material of which that product is made in this country? Your labor and supplies are enhanced in value in proportion as your raw material is advanced.

But you say four fifths of the cost of the product that is made from iron and steel is labor. That is true. Then if one fifth bears a burden of from seventy to one hundred and fifty per cent.—I take the present bill, the rates on steel and iron to illustrate my point—the average being more than one hundred per cent., one fifth of that is twenty per cent. You thus at once dispose of twenty of the forty-five per cent. as provided in this bill, leaving twenty-five per cent. only to counterbalance, first, five per cent. Government tax, which, when augmented by a similar tax on all the products which become a part of your manufacture of machinery, carries your Government tax to eight per cent. The increased interest upon the high cost of your production will not be less than nine per cent. above the foreign. Here you have seventeen per cent. in currency to offset twenty-five per cent. in gold. Reduce it to the gold standard, and you have twelve per cent., leaving thirteen per cent. to be offset, first, by supplies, coal, oil, &c., and the greatest of all is labor which, at the lowest calculation, as Commissioner Wells has determined, is sixty per cent. higher to-day than it was in 1860; reduced to gold is forty per cent. This, in connection with the thirteen per cent. that we must offset, leaves twenty-seven per cent. that is necessary to enable us to preserve our business as manufacturers of machinery. So says the mechanic. We ask, he says, for twenty per cent. We hope we may be able to breast the storm, though we show conclusively that upon the article of cotton machinery we lose ten per cent. or three dollars on a spindle that now costs $30 80. We ask nothing for interest on our capital; we ask nothing for our own labor in carrying on the business.

Commissioner Wells says labor has advanced, and is now sixty per cent. higher than in 1860. He does not tell us how much higher our labor in 1860 was than the labor abroad. He says also that the cost of interest has increased to the American manufacturer to fourteen per cent. The English interest is four or five per cent., which, increased to currency, is, as I have said, seven per cent. The American manufacturer pays seven per cent. more interest than the English manufacturer. I am now basing my calculation upon the present rate of duty on machinery, which is thirty-five per cent. The present duty on steel and iron is sixty-five per cent. We use one fifth of that in the construction of a spindle, or thirteen per cent. Our labor is sixty per cent., and our supplies for the manufacturing of this kind of product, this spindle, is also sixty per cent., (I have no doubt the supplies are larger;) and if four fifths remain, four fifths of sixty is forty per cent. We pay to the Government for immediate tax five per cent., and we accumulate that tax three per cent. by the accumulations of Government tax into the product produced; making eight per cent. in this particular instance, although it is eleven per cent. in some departments of manufactured machinery.

We have, then, first, extra interest, according to Mr. Wells's statement, which is correct, seven per cent.; we have the Government tax, eight per cent.; we have the extra cost of labor over 1860 (without mentioning the addition of percentage to bring our labor then down to the actual labor that existed abroad) sixty per cent.; reduced to the gold basis forty-eight per cent., making sixty-three per cent. Reducing this to a gold basis at thirty-five, we have forty-one per cent. We have thirty-five per cent. in gold that we pay on one fifth the material that enters into the consumption on our product, which is seven per cent. by the present tariff. Adding that to the forty-one per cent. makes forty-eight per cent. Without a dollar of protection on the difference in the price of labor, we find we have been giving a bounty to the English manufacturer of thirteen per cent. in gold to bring his machinery into this country. If this is not a startling fact I must confess my ignorance of the subject.

But let us go on. You have thus thirteen per cent. in gold to overcome. How do you do it? By increasing the duty on the iron and steel that enter into one fifth of this product. The duty will average one hundred per cent. on articles used in the construction of machinery, especially of the one in question. One fifth of one hundred is twenty. We had seven per cent. on the basis of the last tariff. We must therefore add to the premium we give to the English manufacturer twenty less seven, making thirteen per cent., which added to the other thirteen per cent. makes twenty-six per cent. The present tariff increases the duty from thirty-five to forty-five per cent. Deducting that ten per cent. we have sixteen per cent. of a premium that we now give to the English manufacturer to import his machinery into this country. We only ask four per cent. between the cost of labor in this country before the war and what it was in England at the same time, and of course we lose largely by that.

Mr. Commissioner Wells, in his efforts to keep cotton machinery at forty-five per cent., makes use as an illustration of the duty on a pocket-knife, and we are asked, Why do you want greater duties than we give upon pocket-knives? I reply, first, we do not get that, which is fifty-five per cent. A spindle, that we have taken as an illustration, costs in currency $30 80, and weighs one hundred and twenty-four pounds, and one dozen of knives, which would perhaps weigh two pounds, would cost nine dollars per dozen. Three and one third times nine is thirty dollars, or about the cost of a spindle. If one dozen knives weigh two pounds, three and one third times two is six and two thirds pounds of imported material, or material affected by the tariff, enter into the construction of knives to one hundred and twenty-four pounds of same material on spindles. We use in one construction of a spindle nearly twenty times the iron and steel that is used in the construction of a knife. We shall pay nearly twenty times the duty; twenty times more of the seventy to one hundred and fifty per cent. on iron and steel than is paid by knives. We ask but ten per cent. in addition. What a wide difference between the two branches of industry and how much of wisdom there is exhibited in such an arrangement I leave to the Senate to determine. We make a basis of cotton machinery. We could make the same basis upon that of all other machinery. I therefore hope my amendment will prevail.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not know that I understand this amendment exactly; but I think it contains a new principle. Is it customary to provide in the tariff that goods already contracted for and not shipped shall not be subject to the new duties? This proposition is that persons going into the manufacturing business who had contracted for their machinery before the first day of this month, shall be allowed to bring their machinery into the country under the old duties, and then when it comes in, if others want to go into the manufacturing business and buy machinery, they shall be embarrassed so far as the additional duties will embarrass them. If I understand the amendment that seems to be it.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I want in that connection to ask the Senator what cases he wants to provide for by this unusual legislation. I do not understand it. It is a proposition that the manufacturers who have already established their business and have purchased their machinery, and all manufacturers who want to enlarge their business or to commence a new establishment, but who made their contracts prior to the 1st of January, shall have the benefit of the old law, and then if anybody else wants to compete with them hereafter, he will be compelled to pay these high duties. If I understand it, it amounts to about that, and I do not think I can vote for it.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will offer the two propositions involved in his amendment separately.

Mr. JOHNSON. The question can be divided.

Mr. CONNESS. Certainly. I am in favor of the first part of the Senator's amendment, but the latter part of it I should consider very unjust indeed. By another provision of this bill it will be remembered that we propose to collect duties upon all the goods of whatever kind in bond in our warehouses.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Already shipped.

Mr. CONNESS. Already shipped and in bond; and yet here by a special provision the Senator proposes to exempt goods which are in foreign countries, not yet made. That is a proposition that I cannot support.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for a division of the question. I should like to have the amendment read again.

The Secretary read the first part of the amendment on page 87, section seven, line two hundred and ninety-three, to strike out "forty-five" and insert "sixty-five;" so as to make the clause read:

On all machinery not herein otherwise provided for, composed in part of iron or steel, or of any other metal or material, complete or in parts, sixty-five per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask that the question be taken first on that.

Mr. CONNESS. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "sixty-five" and inserting "sixty."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This being an amendment to an amendment—the whole bill now under consideration is an amendment—it is not amendable in the third degree.

Mr. CONNESS. Then it will be in order to move to insert a somewhat lower rate, if this proposition be voted down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the first branch of the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the Senator will modify his amendment to that extent, by inserting "sixty" instead of "sixty-five."

Mr. SPRAGUE. The Senator might just as well ask me to say forty per cent., for it is as clear as that the sun rises and sets that these shops cannot be carried on at any less rate than that which I propose; and we need these shops. If you cut off the machine shops from the manufactories, you may just as well throw your machine shops and manufactures into the ocean; the one is connected with the other just as bread is connected with the life of man almost.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to oppose a matter of this kind; but this is an advance on the present rate of duty of thirty per cent. The present rate of duty is thirty-five per cent. The Senator from Rhode Island proposes to make it sixty-five.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Nearly a hundred per cent.

Mr. SHERMAN. I mean it is an advance on the cost of the article of thirty per cent., or an advance of nearly double the present duties. What reason is given for this? My friend from Rhode Island says we have added to the duties on steel and iron. When this subject was before the committee, and a gentleman was before us who was very much interested in this matter, I asked him, and I asked the question of dozens of others, what proportion do steel and iron bear to the cost of the article?

Mr. SPRAGUE. One fifth.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend says one fifth. The general statement was one tenth. Now take his own statement, one fifth. Here is a machine that costs $100.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Thirty dollars.

Mr. SHERMAN. Any machine. He says thirty dollars. Take a machine that costs thirty dollars. Now the raw material which enters into the manufacture of that machine, according to his statement, is six dollars; according to the general statement made before us three dollars. We have added to the cost of that raw material, six dollars, about fifty cents, or at most, one dollar. Now, because we have added to the cost of the raw material one dollar at the outside, therefore we must add thirty per cent. on the cost of the completed article, or nine dollars. That is the argument.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I go behind that, and say that before this increase of duty, it costs three times as much with the rates as now existing on iron and steel to produce this article of a spindle in this country as it does abroad.

Mr. SHERMAN. Two years ago we framed a tariff law to meet that very difficulty; but now we have increased the duties generally about ten per cent. on certain leading and important staples, in order to protect our industry and to give us more revenue. In order to compensate for that increased duty—for that is all there is required—we are asked to give thirty per cent. on the completed article of manufacture, when the addition to the cost of raw material is only about five per cent. It seems to me that would destroy the object of this bill. I should like very much to accommodate my friend from Rhode Island; there is nobody whom I would more desire to accommodate; but the effect will be that at sixty-five per cent. we shall have no machinery imported into this country, and we shall get no revenue from it. The pretext, or the ground upon which this increase is proposed, is evidently delusive, because the whole increase to the raw material made by this tariff is probably not three per cent. on the present rate of duty.

The Committee on Finance have already allowed ten per cent., or nearly thirty per cent. on the present rates. I believe they report forty-five per cent.; the old duty was thirty-five; and I was perfectly willing at the urgent complaint of these manufacturers to vote for fifty per cent. or even fifty-five per cent., so as to put them on a footing with cutlery, although, as it is manifest, the rates of duty on cutlery being a more expensive article, are usually higher. The rates of duty I believe on table cutlery are fifty per cent.; and I was perfectly willing to vote for fifty per cent. on machinery; but to put it up to sixty-five, it seems to me, would destroy the great object of this bill, to produce revenue, and I cannot vote for it.

Mr. CATTELL. I was of the impression that this machinery was one of the items upon which the Committee on Finance did not put as much duty as was required to protect its manufacture; and I so expressed myself, and am in favor of some additional duty. I ask the gentleman from Rhode Island if he will not consent to modify his motion so as to make it fifty-five per cent. I will vote for that.

Mr. CONNESS. He has refused to make it sixty.

Mr. CATTELL. I was out of the Chamber for a few moments, and did not hear that proposition made. Then I shall most undoubtedly vote against the amendment as it stands, because I believe it to be more than is necessary. A motion to make the duty fifty-five per cent. would meet with my approval.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. SPRAGUE. What is the proposition?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. CONNESS. I will say to the Senator from Rhode Island that the Senator from New Jersey proposes that he modify his amendment so as to say fifty-five per cent. I have already proposed that he should modify it so as to make it sixty per cent. I believe that that is necessary. I believe that you are going to stop the workshops of the country engaged in producing machinery unless you give them a protection to this extent. I do not desire to enter into the question at this time, although I have thought upon it to some extent; but I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will consent to modify his motion as I have suggested, and let us take a vote on sixty per cent.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Very well.

Mr. CONNESS. I understand that the Senator consents to that modification of his motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. EDMUNDS in the chair.) The question, then, is on the first branch of the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island, as modified, on page 37, section seven, line two hundred and ninety-three, to strike out "forty-five" and insert "sixty."

Mr. ANTHONY. I am satisfied that unless there be some additional duty put upon machinery that branch of industry will be driven out of the country. The argument of the Senator from Ohio is not precisely fair. He says that because a large additional duty has been put upon the raw material, therefore we wish a corresponding additional duty put upon the manufactured article, whereas the raw material is but a small portion of the value of the manufactured article. If the advance was demanded on that ground, the answer of the Senator from Ohio would be perfect; but it is not so. The demand is made upon the ground stated by the chairman of the Finance Committee in presenting the bill: that it has been the object of the committee to give protection wherever it was needed.

Mr. President, I am very sorry indeed to give any vote that makes machinery cost more, because, although many of my constituents manufacture machinery, many more of them use it. But leaving entirely out of the question the protection due to our own industry, taking into consideration only the question of national independence, I believe it is of vital importance that we should not drive out of the country the fabrication of iron, and I am quite sure that the present duty reported in this bill is not sufficient to retain that branch of industry. I do not know but that by and by, after labor comes down, it may revive again; but at present, with anything like the present prices of labor, it will be impossible I think to carry it on.

I do not know upon what principle it is that we put a duty of one hundred per cent. upon the manufacture of iron and then put a duty of only forty-five per cent. upon the industry which transforms that iron into a useful machine. I do not know why the one branch of industry is not entitled to just as much protection as the other, provided it needs that protection. I suppose the manufacturer of iron requires a greater degree of protection in order to its successful prosecution than the manufacture of machinery itself; but if you give the manufacturer of iron all that is required to carry on the business successfully, then I do not see why you are not bound to give the same protection to the manufacturer of machinery. I know very well that if we increase the price of machinery we increase the price of the articles which machinery produces, and that increases the cost of living and raises the price of labor, without giving to the laborer really any additional wages; but I do not see how we are to prevent it. If we are to make a beginning we must begin at the bottom and reduce the cost of the raw material; and that, I understand, the committee are not prepared to do, and I do not ask it of them. The reason why we could import machinery under the duty that now exists was that we had gold at 200; that made all the difference in the world; but now machinery is coming in here from England and is laid down here at thirty per cent. less than we can manufacture it. I know that a steam-engine has been manufactured in England, brought here, and laid down thirty per cent. lower than we could manufacture it. I think there ought to be an additional duty on machinery.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not know to what extent this sort of argumentation that has been presented by the honorable Senator will carry us. Now it is made manifest, as it seems, that one hundred per cent. tariff is necessary to enable those engaged in manufacturing iron to conduct their business.

Mr. ANTHONY. And you give it to them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And this tariff bill gives it to them. Now the manufacturer of steel says, "You have fixed a tariff of one hundred per cent. on iron; our business is to make iron into steel, and you must favor us with the same duty that you do the manufacturer of iron;" and so you add another hundred per cent., making two hundred per cent. And now here comes the man who makes that steel into machinery, and he says he must have one hundred per cent.; and so we pile one tariff upon another until the cost of the article, when it is finally finished, to the consumer is made fabulous. There is some fallacy about this reasoning somewhere; because that is the legitimate result of it. That is the argument that is urged here on every hand. Every Senator who addresses the Senate with reference to these articles manufactured of steel commences by saying, "You have levied so much upon iron; we are entitled to as much as the men who make the iron; and so it goes on from one thing to another until the articles come to be so high that nobody can afford to use them."

I do not pretend to know as much about these things as many other Senators who live in manufacturing States; but one idea that operated upon my mind was this—

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senate goes further than that and protects materials in the bowels of the earth, for fear they may be driven out of the country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly, and that is a true proposition on the same system of argument. If a man discovers a mine in this country anywhere, immediately a tariff is imposed upon the article, and the effect of discovering a mine in this country is to make the article higher than it was before the mine was discovered. That is the general proposition; but that is not pertinent to this question.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is just what the Senate have done.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know they have done it, but I did not help to do it.

But I was about to state the idea which influenced me more than any other to vote for this report. I am not disposed to oppose a reasonable increase; but the great cry in this country is, that the manufacturers need protection; that the men who make the woollens and the cottons in the country need protection; and that was the reason I thought that if you put a high tariff upon the machinery, to that extent you injured the manufacturing interest of the country; that unless the manufacturing interest, which seems to be demanding and needs the most protection—

Mr. CONNESS. And so destroy another class to save them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not suppose that a duty of forty-five per cent. would destroy them, and, as the honorable Senator from Ohio said, it is impossible to show how it does destroy them; because the argument proceeds upon the assumption that the tariff upon iron and steel has increased the value of those two articles, and yet the same showing makes it appear that they constitute an inconsiderable part of this machinery; so that it is not because a high tariff is imposed upon the iron and the steel that this great duty is necessary; it must be for some other reason. I suppose the main reason is because labor is higher in this country than it is in England. I should be willing, if it be the mind of those gentlemen of the Senate who understand the manufacturing business better than I do, to increase this duty. I do not propose to be obstinate in reference to the matter; but it is difficult to see, while the men who conduct the manufacturing business of the country are clamoring for protection, how we protect them if we impose an additional price upon the very articles they use in that business.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I do not want to impose an additional tax upon the cotton and woolen manufacturers; I do not want to make their machinery expensive; but this fact, in my opinion, is abundantly proved, and I think the chairman of the Committee on Finance will agree with me that, unless there be some additional duty, the fabrication of iron machinery must, for the present at least, cease in this country. Whether that result is desirable or not others can judge for themselves; but I believe that will be the result. I expressly disclaimed, as the Senator from Oregon would have heard if he had listened to me, demanding a higher duty upon machinery because there has been a higher duty imposed on iron. I know that the iron forms but a small part of the cost of the machinery.

Mr. WILSON. In some kinds of machinery it forms a good deal of the cost.

Mr. ANTHONY. It does in some kinds of machinery, but it does not form a fifth in this case, and generally not so much. I stated that an increased duty was necessary because at the present price of gold and at the present rate of duty machinery is brought from England and laid down here for thirty per cent. less than we can make it. Senators will judge for themselves whether they wish to correct that or not.

The difficulty that the Senator from Oregon enlarges upon I perceive as well as he does. I perceive that when you put an enormous duty upon the manufacture of iron you are obliged to put a duty upon the manufactures made from iron, and when you put it on those manufactures you are obliged to put an equal duty upon the goods which the iron machines are employed to manufacture; but if that system is not right, then you must begin at the bottom and take the duty off the iron, because wherever you stop you destroy the industry that you stop with. If the edifice is going to topple over it is best to strengthen the foundation of it.

With regard to the great duties that the manufacturers of cotton and wool demand I think the Senator exaggerates them. I do not think the manufacturers of cotton and woollens demand great duties. If they do they certainly have not been accommodated in this bill; for the duties on cottons are somewhat lower; the duties on linens are lower; and in the duties on wool and woollens the committee have accepted the House bill with regard to the advance on wool, but have not accepted it on woollens.

Mr. FESSENDEN. One of the items on which the charge was predicated on woolen manufactures in the House bill was the duty on dye-stuffs, and we have taken off the duty on dye-stuffs in almost every instance.

Mr. ANTHONY. That does not amount to so much as the reduction of duty on woollens from the rates of the House bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Oh, yes, it does.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am not so informed. The Senator probably knows better than I do.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We did not make the calculations ourselves, but had them made by an expert with the direction to make the duties conform.

Mr. ANTHONY. I submit to the superior information of the committee, and I have no doubt it is correct. But with regard to the great duties demanded by the woolen and cotton manufacturers, one of the largest manufacturers and one of the most intelligent men in the country said to me the other day, "Give me the free importation of my raw material; relieve me from all internal taxes; impose a duty of twenty-five per cent. and collect it, and it is all I want; that would be better than the present bill, and better than any bill I have had."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no doubt it would be.

Mr. ANTHONY. But with such enormous duties, duplicated and quadrupled upon everything that enters into the fabrication of their goods, it is impossible for them to get along without corresponding duties.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have had the impression that there ought to be a slight increase of the duties on machinery; but by no means so much as is stated by the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. SPRAGUE.] I am informed, however, that a very accurate calculator, after calculating the duties—he made an accurate calculation last night—says that even forty-five per cent. is one and one eighth cent over the duties imposed upon the raw material, iron and steel; so that in reality they have more protection. How true it is I do not know. He undoubtedly believes it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Than under the present tariff?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir; as we have fixed it.

Mr. ANTHONY. In the bill reported?

Mr. FESSENDEN. In the bill as we reported it, taking the increased duties on steel and iron and the increased duties on machinery.

Mr. ANTHONY. That the increase on machinery is more than the increase on the raw material?

Mr. FESSENDEN. In proportion.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think that very likely. I expressly said that this demand was not made in consequence of the increase on iron; but it seemed to me the same principle that made the duty of one hundred to one hundred and twenty per cent. upon iron and steel would justify a duty of more than forty-five per cent. upon machinery.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It depends entirely upon the proportion. If the increase now is greater than that on the raw material out of which it is made, that ought to be satisfactory, unless the business was languishing before.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is the case precisely. The reduction of the price of gold would have destroyed the business but for protection.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to state the whole case. There was one fact that was not denied, and that was that the business of the manufacture of machinery in this country was so pressing that the machine-shops could not fill the orders offered them in the time the machinery was required, and in consequence those who offered them were obliged to send to Europe in order to get the machinery made in the time they wanted it. The orders were so great that the manufacturers of machinery could not fill them for want of time and ability to complete them.

Mr. ANTHONY. And also owing, if the Senator will allow me, to the diversion of a large portion of the fabricators of iron to the service of the country during the war. That made a great difference.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That may be. At any rate more orders were offered to them than they could fill, even at the old prices.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is undoubtedly so; but the fact upon which this demand is made is, that under the existing tariff machinery can be laid down in this country from abroad thirty per cent. cheaper than it can be manufactured here. I know that one of the largest machine-makers and one of the best in the country, and I think from the Senator's own State, has gone out of the business of manufacturing and gone into the business of importing machinery—Mr. Thompson, of your State, one of the best mechanics in the country.

Mr. CONNESS. More than that, they take orders and import the machinery and fill the orders, and make a profit on the transaction.

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly; and one of the largest machine-makers in my State told me that for himself he was very indifferent as to the increased duties on machinery; he could make quite as much by importing as he could by manufacturing it; but he employs a thousand men, and they and their families consume two or three thousand barrels of flour and a great deal of wheat, pork, and beef, and all that would be consumed in England if we shut up these shops.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator had not interrupted me, I was about saying that, notwithstanding these different statements, I was so strongly impressed with the idea that this interest is suffering at the present time for need of protection that I was willing to go as high as the Senator from New Jersey suggested, fifty-five per cent., adding ten per cent. to the rate in the bill, which I think is about right, and with which I think this interest ought to be satisfied. That I should be willing to submit to as against the report of the committee; but I should not be willing to go as high as sixty per cent. If they cannot get along with fifty-five per cent. it is very singular under the circumstances.

While I am up I wish to notice a remark made yesterday by the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. SPRAGUE.] He gave us something to think of over night; he said he wished to throw out something that we might for our edification digest if we could during the night, and by the time we got here to-day be ready to say whether it had agreed with us or not. I refer to the statement which he made that this was a commercial tariff. If so, God help commerce, for there is no help from any tariff if this is a commercial tariff. He attempted to prove it by instancing the duties on cotton goods. I am informed by the commissioner that these duties were fixed at a rate perfectly satisfactory to those engaged in the manufacture of cottons, who appeared before him, and generally to everybody except in regard to some of the higher grades of cotton where we have increased the tariff. The cotton interest of this country has got so that it can stand of itself pretty much. The manufacturers in Massachusetts, I believe, have not troubled Congress for an increase of the duties on cottons, except on one or two of the higher grades, where a little addition has been allowed them.

With regard to linens we went upon a different principle. The Senator instanced linens and cottons. We thought that in the present condition of the country we are not in a state to deny ourselves everything for the sake of protecting everything. It is not a good time to do it. It is a good time to protect our established industries; and we must do that if we can, and afford reasonable protection to other interests which are beginning to be developed, but not such a protection as will raise the price of the articles to the consumer so largely as it would upon those industries which have not yet begun to be sufficiently developed. We acted upon that principle with regard to linens.

With regard to the manufactures of jute, we went upon the principle that as that article was altogether raised abroad it was important to reduce the duties on the raw material as much as possible in order to encourage the manufacture of it in this country.

We did not apply, and I do not know how any one can apply, a regular level to every industry in the country. My friend from West Virginia in his zeal wanted us to protect that mountain from which so many beautiful ores are extracted for fear it would be driven out of the country if we did not protect it; and that is the case with a good many raw materials buried in the bowels of the earth that Senators say will be driven out of the country if we do not protect them. We had supposed the best protection we could give to them was by raising up an industry in the country to manufacture the material itself, which would protect it by giving a good ground for its development; but that does not seem to be satisfactory. I did not give a great deal of reflection, as my friend from Rhode Island has suggested, to what he stated last evening in regard to this being a commercial tariff; and I really would rather wait to hear him make it out, for I think that if any interest suffers under it it must be commerce.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Mr. President, I take the gentleman at his own word and will endeavor to make it out. If I recollect his argument as to crash, it was that we were upon terms of amity with Russia and we should continue those relations, and therefore should so arrange the duties as to continue to import crash from Russia. Was this otherwise than for the purpose of protecting commerce? Is not that an element which does protect commerce?

The Senator has risen in his seat several times and declared that the commercial interests of the country demand attention as well as the manufacturing. It seemed to be a topic with him throughout nearly all of yesterday afternoon to defend commerce. I think the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Maine are both mistaken in the suggestions they made on that point.

I complain of this tariff because the Senator from Maine and the Finance Committee have been pressed by organizations which have forced the articles of iron and steel up to a rate of duties so great as to prohibit almost entirely the introduction of those commodities into this country; and while doing that they seem to forget that the articles of iron and steel and wool enter largely into the production of cottons and of linens; and yet we find that by the wisdom of this committee and of the commissioner the duties on the latter articles are reduced. The Senator tells us this was in accordance with the recommendation of the cotton interest. Did the cotton interest know that a large proportion of the material that they were to employ in the production of their cottons was to be advanced and they not get a corresponding advance in the protection of their industry? So of the linen interest.

Another thing which the Senator has forgotten and which the country does not seem to understand is, that prior to the war the importation of coarser cottons was driven from the market by the production of those cottons in this country, and the consequence was that the English machinery was put upon a different kind of commodity, a finer article. Now, however, the English manufacturer and his agents have been to this country, and we find him producing upon plans that have become stereotyped and acceptable in the markets of this country, and introducing here to-day every article known to American industry, and from twenty to thirty per cent. lower than we can produce it. The reason of this is because certain styles become popular. In the construction of a locomotive, for example, the people of this country demand a certain style and model and will go abroad for it; and the English manufacturer will come here, take styles that are acceptable to our people and go abroad and manufacture them and send them here. In this way every workshop in this country may be destroyed under the present system. When I say so I speak what I know. By this bill you enhance the value of a material part of the products that enter into the manufacture of cottons and linens. Did the cotton and linen manufacturers understand that when they said they were satisfied? Certainly not.

I think this is a commercial tariff, for the reason that it will give to foreign nations and to what commerce we now have the carrying trade of materials that have heretofore been manufactured and produced in this country. They will be produced abroad, and foreign commerce will be used to introduce them into this country; and why? Because of the sickly sentimental idea that prevails here that you are to pay off the national debt in a hurry, and that you must tax the people more heavily for that purpose, and continue to tax, tax, with that view. Have you not taxed them sufficiently during the war? Have you not drawn from them one half of their property? Must you continue that policy? Must you drive from employment every laboring man in this country and send all our work abroad to be done?

Why, sir, what is the condition of the immigrants who arrive in our ports from Europe? Do they remain here? Is it not a startling fact that many of them return to take the pittance their labor receives on the other side of the water? Why is it? It is because of the increased demand for their labor there to produce supplies for this country. That is the reason they go back, and they will continue to go back; and instead of coming here they will remain there, and many now here will find great difficulty in getting labor to enable them to purchase the supplies necessary for their subsistence.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not wish to be misunderstood. The Senator says the burden of my song yesterday was protection to commerce. I deny it entirely. I do not think I mentioned the subject much yesterday. What I said in the beginning I stick to; that in the construction of a tariff bill of this description, while the main great object is followed of protecting American industry, we must, in some cases, take into consideration the effect that certain duties will have upon our commerce. That is what I stated, and I still maintain that position, for I do not wish to be considered a man of one idea. I would rather be able to look upon all the interests that are involved and have a tendency to produce benefit to our country and increase its wealth and its power.

I shall not attempt to follow the Senator in what he has stated. He argues always precisely in the same line, and that is that there is nothing to be considered but protection, and principally the protection of cotton manufactures, and that, after all, if you look out and protect cottons well the whole object of legislation is accomplished. I do not agree with him in that particular, and therefore it is hardly worth while for us to enter into discussion.

Mr. SPRAGUE. In answer to that, I will simply call attention to the fact that I am an advocate of protection to other interests.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, upon the point made by the honorable Senator, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, the necessity of looking to the protection of commerce and the recognition of it as a great industry, without which a nation cannot live and be great, I entirely agree with him. What we try to aim at in legislation here on this subject is, that all the great branches of industry shall prosper under our hand. But I rose not to continue that theme; because, although it is interesting and has been ably handled by the Senators who have spoken, it has sunk the amendment before us pretty much out of view. The present proposition is to advance the duty imposed upon machinery coming from abroad. I go back to the position taken by the leading Senators, and accepted by all: that when we consider the matter of protecting home industry, the wise thing to do, the necessary thing to do, is to ascertain by a collection of facts what classes of industry require the protection, what classes of production can be obtained abroad, where other people are employed than our own; and brought into our country at a cheaper rate than our people can afford to be paid for making them, and apply the duty there, so that our own people may be employed at home.

I think it is conceded that the duty proposed upon machinery is not sufficient to afford the necessary protection. When it becomes so that a manufacturer of machinery may send his orders abroad, import the machinery, and sell it to his customers, who do not know that it has been manufactured in England at a profit, it is time to advance the duty upon it, as I think; and my opinion is that the amendment now before the Senate does not propose too great an increase of the duty. I believe that if you accept such a proposition as the one now before the Senate you will empty our workshops where machinery is manufactured of the mechanics of the country.

In crossing the Atlantic last August after our adjournment I had the company of a very intelligent American, largely engaged in the manufacture of machinery. I had many conversations with him upon the subject. I found him to be a very able and intelligent gentleman, entirely at home upon the subject. He showed to me clearly that the tax imposed upon the material out of which sewing-machines were manufactured was so great that they could not manufacture them in our own country at a profit, and that they were compelled now to transfer their workshops, and would have to do it if the duties were kept up on the raw materials, to England, and have their machines manufactured there, bring them in at the duty imposed upon them, and sell them to their customers in America. This was, as I have said, from a very able man and one interested in a low duty upon machines, not interested in a high duty, for his position was, "reduce the tax that you now impose upon the raw material or else we will go abroad and manufacture, and must do it and will do it, because we can do it and pay your duty." Here we have the testimony, as I again repeat, of an able man interested against the very testimony that he gave. Now, I hope the Senate will adopt the pending amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. How much percentage does that propose?

Mr. CONNESS. Sixty per cent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. EDMUNDS in the chair.) The question is on the first branch of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. GRIMES called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 15, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Conness, Cresswell, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Howard, Howe, Morrill, Sprague, Stewart, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, and Wilson—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Grimes, Henderson, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Norton, Patterson, Ramsey, Sherman, and Williams—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Bucknley, Cowan, Cragin, Dixon, Foster, Guthrie, Harris, Hendricks, McDougall, Nesmith, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, Sumner, Trumbull, and Yates—20.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first branch of the amendment is rejected, and the question now recurs on the second branch, to insert after line two hundred and ninety-three of section seven the words:

Provided, That all machinery contracted for in good faith before January 1, 1867, shall be admitted at the rate of duty provided for by law at the date of said contract.

Mr. FESSENDEN. How are you going to tell that?

Mr. ANTHONY. It will be determined under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no; vote it down.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it ought to be adopted, and I will state the reason why. The case does not stand, as the Senator from Indiana stated, on the same basis as imported goods bought in the open market. The date is fixed at which this bill is to go into effect, the 1st of April. That gives time for all goods that have already been bought in good faith to come in under the present rates of duty, which is manifestly proper, because the Government has told its citizens that they could import goods at certain rates, and on the faith of that law they have bought goods and they ought to be allowed to bring them in at that rate. Everybody admits that. I wish now to bring machinery contracted for under the same rule, because you cannot go into the market and buy machinery as you can buy cotton and woolen goods, carpets, and pig iron. It is not there; it is not made to order and sold in the markets of Europe; but it is contracted for. Therefore if you mean to give to the importer of machinery the same advantage you give to the importer of any other goods, you must give him, after he has contracted for the manufacture, the same privilege you give to others for the purchase of goods. It is manifestly inequitable to do otherwise.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If this machinery be kept out of the country by this tariff, does not that enable the American manufacturers to make the machinery and thus protect them?

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly not, because the machinery is already contracted for. The question is whether you will allow a man to bring in his machinery at the rate of duty you told him he might when he agreed to have it manufactured, or whether, after he has made his contract on the faith of your tariff, you will increase the duty.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to know what distinction the Senator would make between that case and the one I will state. A man imports a certain quantity of goods, no matter of what kind, and puts them in bond; and we pass a tariff bill, as we have done repeatedly, saying that upon those very goods in bond imported under that tariff he shall pay a higher duty.

Mr. ANTHONY. But you put the operation of the new tariff sufficiently ahead to let him take his goods out.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Repeatedly not. Sometimes we have made the bill go into effect the day it passes.

Mr. ANTHONY. But I think the Senator himself agreed with me that it was a very unjust proceeding.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I gave notice at one time that in that particular bill I would exempt goods in bond, but that afterward in all tariffs I would insist upon putting on the duties of the new bill at once, and I have acted on that principle. In regard to this bill we have named the 1st day of April as the day for it to take effect. Whether that will be agreed to by the House, whether they will not put it sooner, or whether they will not put it precisely as the original bill was, that it should take effect immediately upon its passage, I do not know.

Mr. ANTHONY. We shall have to do as the Senator says about that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is very likely that the House will disagree to the time we have fixed, and then that will be a matter of compromise. Perhaps we have put it too far ahead. At any rate, it is only an expression of opinion on the part of the Senate, and at the time it was agreed to perhaps we did not think sufficiently of the ease with which an order can now go to Europe, and how our country might be filled up between now and the 1st day of April. Since we passed the last tariff bill the Atlantic telegraph has been put in operation.

I only say this to show that it is uncertain what will finally be done on that point, and that any operations founded upon our action by people who send out orders simply because the Senate have fixed the 1st of April may prove entirely fallacious. But at any rate, as we have adopted that principle, and acted upon it in tariff after tariff, I see no reason why the importers of machinery not yet made should not precisely come under the same operation, and if they bring it in pay the duty prescribed. I have no idea of legislating exclusively for the benefit of those who are rich enough to send out and get their machinery made abroad and imported here at the same time that we put a heavy duty on anybody else who imports it.

Mr. ANTHONY. It does not require any richer man to import machinery at sixty-six cents than it does to manufacture it here at a dollar, and I think this amendment places the importer of machinery on precisely the same platform as the importer of other articles.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONNESS. I now renew the first part of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. SPRAGUE,] only substituting fifty-five for sixty per cent.; so as to make the clause read:

On all machinery not herein otherwise provided for, composed in part of iron or steel or any other metal or material, complete or in parts, fifty-five per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. CATTELL. I hope that amendment will prevail.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to amend by striking out lines thirteen, fourteen, and fifteen of section eight, on page 38, in these words:

On copper ore, ten per cent. ad valorem.
On regulus of copper, fifteen per cent. ad valorem.
On copper in pigs, ingots, or bars, four cents per pound.

And in lieu of them to insert:

On all copper imported in the form of ore, three cents per pound.
On copper imported in the form of regulus, four cents per pound.
On copper in pigs, ingots, or bars, five cents per pound.

Some years ago, before the imposition of internal revenue taxes, the duty on copper was fixed at two and a half cents per pound, which was an ample protection to our copper mines at that time. From time to time, as taxation increased, it was discovered that the miners, those engaged in mining copper, actually paid a larger amount of duty in the form of internal revenue to Government than the amount which purported to protect them. Under a duty of two and a half cents per pound the mines were prosperous and went on increasing until the product of the Lake Superior mines alone amounted to about ten thousand tons per annum, and we shipped many hundreds and for aught I know many thousands of tons to France, because our copper was of a purer and better quality, softer, and more malleable than copper obtained elsewhere. But since the great increase of the internal revenue taxation many of our mines have stopped working, and our product has now fallen from ten thousand tons or thereabouts to near six or seven thousand tons per annum.

Under this duty, as I am assured by the miners, by those interested in the mines, they will be compelled to stop entirely. The ten per cent. imposed by the bill is of course upon the foreign valuation—the valuation in Cuba or Chili or wherever the ore comes from—and it is almost an inappreciable tax. I propose to place a definite tax upon the ore after it is smelted. The progenitors of this tariff bill have gone upon the presumption that ore was a raw material. The whole expense of the ore is in the labor of getting it out of the mines, and the ore is then just within three per cent. of ingot copper. It costs only three per cent. to smelt the ore into ingot copper. I propose, therefore, to make a distinction of one cent a pound between copper in the ore and regulus which has gone through one process of smelting, and one cent between regulus and copper in the bar.

I have before me the sworn testimony taken before the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives of some of the most reputable gentlemen engaged in this mining business. They show that prior to last winter each one hundred pounds of copper mined in Lake Superior actually paid into the Treasury of the United States $4 63; but last winter $1 08 was taken off in the shape of direct internal revenue taxes, leaving $3 55, the amount which is now paid into the Treasury upon every one hundred pounds of copper raised from the mine. I do not propose to place the amount of duty as high as the amount now actually paid into the Treasury in the form of internal revenue taxation. The amount of internal revenue taxes paid upon one hundred pounds can be ascertained to a perfect certainty, because the owners of every mine are compelled to keep a store to supply their operatives with everything they consume; and in this sworn testimony, as I see, they have shown that they paid $3 63 upon every hundred of ore that was raised, and now they pay $3 55. I now propose to fix a duty of three cents per pound on foreign ore smelted, and I think any man at all acquainted with the mining operations of the country will say that that is certainly reasonable and just and proper.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Whenever the duty is raised upon copper as the gentleman proposes, then again the argument will be urged that we have heard so often, "You have put a very high tariff upon the raw material, and now you must add to the duties upon every manufactured article into which that material enters," and that illustrates, it seems to me, the folly of imposing these high duties upon what constitute raw materials for the manufacturing business of the country. This bill already adds very much to the duties upon copper. On copper ore the bill places a duty of ten per cent. ad valorem; the present tariff is five per cent. ad valorem; so that this bill, as it was reported by the committee, doubles the duty upon copper ore, and it would seem that that ought to be a sufficient advance of the duty upon the raw material. Then on the regulus of copper the bill of the committee puts a duty of twenty per cent. ad valorem, while the present duty is only five per cent. Here is an increase from five per cent. to twenty per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is only ten per cent. in the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We have made it fifteen per cent. on regulus of copper.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I see that I was mistaken; I was referring to the report of the commissioner instead of the report of the committee. The committee propose fifteen per cent. duty on regulus of copper, and the present tariff is five per cent. On copper in pigs, ingots, or bars the present tariff is two and a half cents; the committee report four cents a pound, which is nearly double.

This copper is a raw material. It is produced from the mines in this country. It is very essential in the construction of ships and vessels, and if such a duty be imposed as to make copper much more expensive the entire business of ship-building in the United States will be transferred to Europe. Besides, this copper is used in very many other ways, and it is stated that those engaged in the production of this ore are not successful in their business, or that they do not produce as much now as they did at a former day. That may be attributable to many causes. I do not know that it is to be assumed that this reduction in the production of copper is attributable to the lowness of the tariff or to importations into this country; it may have been produced by other causes. I have seen statements in the newspapers—and my attention was called to them from the fact that the tariff bill was pending, and this copper question was one that would be considered before the Senate—to the effect that the copper business was prospering, that new mines had been discovered, that the amount of copper produced was increasing, and that those engaged in the business were engaged in a profitable business. They were mere newspaper statements though, and perhaps not entitled to very much confidence. I only mention them because upon these subjects there are always more or less conflicting statements.

But, Mr. President, it seems to me, in view of the other interests of the country, in consideration of the fact that this is a raw material, the addition of one hundred per cent. to the present duty is as much as ought to be imposed at this time, and I hope that this amendment will not prevail.

Mr. STEWART. I hope this amendment will prevail. I represent a constituency that is not engaged in manufacturing at all, but still I am willing to vote for high tariffs on the articles they consume, because I want them to buy from the people of the United States. The United States are building railroads to us and improving the country, and I prefer to buy in the United States. I think the good of the country requires that these articles should be protected in a reasonable way.

In regard to this matter of copper, the Senate may not be aware that we have on the Pacific coast and in the interior of the country, between that and the Mississippi valley, a large amount of copper ore, veins undeveloped, but which are very rich. The other taxation upon the production of copper ore is so great that the mines on the Pacific coast remain undeveloped. A mine in California must be very rich, very superior to one in Chili to justify working it so as to come in competition with the product of the latter. In consequence of the high price our miners have to pay for their supplies, their clothing, and everything they consume, as compared with the cost of the same articles in Chili, the same class of copper mines cannot be worked there so as to compete with Chili. As the mining of copper is comparatively in its infancy in the United States, and we have an abundance of copper ore—enough to supply the world if we could only develop it—it seems to me that it should be protected, and I hope that the amendment of the Senator from Michigan will prevail.

A duty of ten per cent. ad valorem on copper ore imported is no protection. It is the most difficult thing in the world to ascertain the real value of it, and the provision can be evaded without the slightest difficulty in regard to the ores from Mexico and South America. If we are to have our mines developed under the existing state of things we must have some protection to this product.

Mr. CHANDLER. The mistake the Senator from Oregon makes is in considering copper ore a raw material. As I said, it just costs three per cent. to smelt it; it is within three per cent. of ingot copper, and hence the error the committee have made in making so great a discrimination between the copper ore and ingot copper. The fact is that copper mining has been carried on at a loss with prices at from twenty-eight to thirty cents, when six years ago it was carried on at a profit at prices from sixteen to twenty cents.

Such is the fact to-day. The increase in the price of labor, the increase of the cost of living, and the increase of the cost of transportation have carried the expenses up to double. If there has been a profit anywhere in copper mining it has been with the smelters, who had this large advantage over the miners.

As has been justly said by the Senator from Nevada, ten per cent. duty on the ore is almost inappreciable, because it is the duty paid on the value in Chili or Peru or wherever the ore comes from, without counting the additional cost of transportation. I ask for a less duty on the copper after it is smelted than is to-day and has been paid in the shape of internal revenue tax upon every hundred pounds of copper raised in the United States. Certainly it is just and right and proper that we should have the same protection, which would be three and fifty-five hundredths cents instead of three cents a pound, which is all I propose. I hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I find in a journal entitled the American Mining Index a statement of the production of copper in one county in the State of Michigan, the county Keweenaw, and I find there this extract from a paper published in that county:

"It appears upon comparison with the previous year (1865) that although there were less mines working in the district, nevertheless there was a gratifying increase in the number of tons of copper shipped the present season over the previous one of three hundred and eighty-nine tons."

I find that from that one county there were shipped last year three thousand six hundred and twenty-three tons and eight hundred and ninety-one pounds of copper, and the increase over the previous year, in round numbers, was three hundred and eighty-nine tons, showing that the production of copper in that one county amounted to between three and four thousand tons, and that the production increased in 1866 over that of 1865. On this statement I do not think the business is suffering; I do not think this tariff is necessary to enable those engaged in this mining business to prosecute their labor and produce copper.

And, sir, if copper be not a raw material, there is no such thing as a raw material. There is comparatively, with the many other interests into which copper enters, but a small proportion of capital employed in the production of copper ore; and it is manifest that if this excessive protection is given to the capital and the labor employed in the production of copper ore—digging this ore out of the ground—other great interests in the country which cannot be prosecuted without the use of copper must necessarily suffer. It is a fact—it does not seem to have much weight here, but it is a fact—that the ship-building business of this country is rapidly crossing the ocean, and that that immense interest is passing into the hands of the British ship-builders. A tax of this kind upon copper will further tend to drive that business out of the country, and prevent persons who otherwise might engage in the business of building ships from engaging in that pursuit.

Mr. FOSTER. The Senator will excuse me for interrupting him on that point. I can inform him that in the largest ship-building district in this country at the present time there is but one ship on the stocks. I do not think, therefore, the business will be diminished a great deal.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let me tell the Senator from Oregon that there is a clause in this very bill giving a drawback on all copper and iron materials used in ship-building. I think that very unjust, but I shall not attack it if my amendment prevails.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is true, that drawback is provided for; but I do not think that is a sufficient reason why the tariff on copper should be increased in the manner proposed by the Senator from Michigan. I only refer to ship-building as an illustration. I suppose copper is used in a great many other ways beside in the business of building ships, and this will affect all the interests in which the use of copper is necessary.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to ask the Senator from Oregon from what paper it was that he read.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This paper is entitled the American Mining Index, and the extract contained in it which I read is taken from the Keweenaw Times.

Mr. HOWARD. I fancy the article in that paper simply relates to one single mine, which happens to have been very fortunate. I am somewhat familiar with the gentlemen engaged in the mining interests in my State, and it is the uniform complaint with those gentlemen that the internal revenue tax upon their industry has been so onerous that it has produced the effect of discouraging the working of the mines, although there has been a small duty on the imported article. They have been the losers between the upper and nether millstone. The duty upon the imported article has not been sufficient by any means to counterbalance the burden imposed upon them under the internal revenue laws; and instead of making money from this business, I believe it to be true that for the last year or so, as a general fact, they have been losing; and the fact is undoubtedly true that the companies are getting discouraged and are upon the point, many of them at least, of giving up their business and going into liquidation in consequence of the burdens which are thus imposed upon them.

I really hope that this amendment of my colleague will be adopted. I think the country in the end will derive a very great benefit from it, because it will tend to encourage the production of copper, an article that enters into almost all the machinery of the country, upon railroads, upon ships, and almost every other description of machinery.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I was anxious myself that such duties should be placed upon copper as would tend to increase the manufacture of it and protect it, and I thought this bill was so arranged as to accomplish that purpose. If the Senators from Michigan think it is not, I have no objection to letting them have it their own way, so far as I am individually concerned; but my opinion is, derived from the best information I can obtain on the subject, that the course they are taking is destroying their own object. Take copper ore. Nobody thinks of laying a very heavy duty on the ore or regulus of copper. There is a very small quantity imported, and it is imported for the purpose of working the copper ores of this country. They cannot be worked without it, and that is what it is used for, and for that purpose it is imported to a small extent. Those who manufacture copper from imported ore mix it with the ores of California or the ores of Michigan in order to work it.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is a mistake.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is all a mistake, I suppose, but I get it from people who are engaged in the business, who import it for that purpose, and who seem to be very much interested in it. The statement certainly applies to the ores of California.

Mr. CHANDLER. It does not apply to the Michigan ores.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am inclined to think it does. The idea of imposing this very high duty upon ore which comes in in such small quantities for the mere purpose of being mixed with our ores, and especially for the benefit of the copper mines on the Pacific coast, whose ore cannot be worked without it, is to me somewhat mysterious.

In order to protect copper you must build up the manufacture of copper. It is of no use to get out the ore and not manufacture it in this country. You must, therefore, do something to help the manufacturers reduce it to shape, and that is the principal and about the only purpose for which foreign copper ore is introduced. Even though that is the case, the committee have doubled the duty on copper ore, putting it up from five per cent. to ten per cent., and trebled the duty on regulus of copper, putting that up from five to fifteen per cent.; and with reference to copper in pigs, we have carried that duty up from two and one half to four cents a pound. The House put it at five cents. I think the rates we have fixed are high enough for all purposes, and that on the ore and on the regulus, if any fault can be found with it, is too high, and it will only produce an injurious effect on the very result my friends from Michigan want to accomplish, and that is a larger production. But, sir, I am not going to contest the matter. It is their interest particularly, and if they are willing to take the risk I am willing to let them do it, as far as I am concerned, though I cannot vote for it, because it is against my judgment.

Mr. CHANDLER. Gentlemen call ore a raw material. I have seen ores taken out of the mines in blocks yielding ninety-seven per cent. of pure copper and weighing four or five thousand pounds. In other words, they are copper blocks and yet they are ore.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If it is so pure and so much superior to all other copper ore, why is copper ore brought from foreign countries at all?

Mr. CHANDLER. Because it is more expensive to get out. It has to be cut out with a cold chisel, and it is more expensive to mine it than it is to mine ore that has only four or five per cent. It is more expensive also to get it to market. And yet copper so taken from the mine in this way is called a raw material; and men talk of these blocks of pure copper, or at least yielding ninety-seven per cent., as raw material. There is a block in the Washington Monument of Michigan copper ninety-seven per cent. Anybody can go there and look at that block, Michigan's contribution to the Washington Monument; pure copper, just as it was mined from the mine. If it had been thrown into the smelting mill it would have turned out ninety-seven per cent.

The explanation of the article read by the Senator from Oregon is very simple. The men at Keweenaw Point have added to their machinery very much. They had an immense amount of rock on hand, a great many thousand tons, which they could not work with their old machinery. They had been accumulating for years, and I believe they have been at work for the past year grinding up that accumulation of years, and have increased their quantity there; but the mining interests of Lake Superior, as a whole, have fallen off more than one third, and I believe one half, and they have actually been compelled to abandon all but their richest mines. Now, if it is the policy of the Senate to have these mines abandoned and send your coin abroad or your bonds, at sixty-six cents on the dollar, to buy copper when your mountains are full of it, so be it; but I assure Senators that this is not a sufficient protection to keep our mines going. The House I think recommended twenty per cent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Twenty per cent. on the regulus?

Mr. CHANDLER. Fifteen per cent. on the ore and twenty per cent. on the regulus, and five cents a pound, I think, as I have it, upon the copper in the pig. I prefer, if I can get, the specific sums named in my amendment. They amount substantially to the same rates that are fixed in the House bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What percentage are they?

Mr. CHANDLER. About the same as the House bill; fifteen and twenty per cent. respectively—as near that as you can possibly get at it. My amendment is virtually the same as the House proposition in this respect. I hope the Senate will sustain this amendment; it is but just, and it is the lowest sum that will enable our mines to work. The House of Representatives went into a thorough investigation; they took the sworn testimony of a great many witnesses. I have it before me; but I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senate in reading it; but the best and most experienced miners swore that this is the lowest sum that will enable them to run their mines.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to submit to the Senate two or three amendments, occupying as little time as possible. The first relates to the subject of zinc.

Mr. SPRAGUE. If the Senator will give way I will move an adjournment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before putting the question on that motion the Chair will lay before the Senate certain bills from the House of Representatives for reference.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 666) authorizing the Secretary of War to purchase certain property for military purposes—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

A bill (H. R. No. 820) for the relief of Henry S. Davis—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

A bill (H. R. No. 967) for the relief of James Hooper, of Baltimore, Maryland—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (H. R. No. 1044) for the relief of John Gray, a revolutionary soldier—to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. No. 1045) for the relief of Daniel Frederick Bakeman, a revolutionary soldier—to the Committee on Pensions.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 211) for the relief of George W. Lane, superintendent of the branch mint at Denver, Colorado, and Assistant Treasurer of the United States—to the Committee on Claims.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 244) to amend existing laws relating to internal revenue—to the Committee on Finance.

The amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. No. 99) for the relief of Paul S. Forbes, under his contract with the Navy Department for building and furnishing the steam screw sloop-of-war Idaho, were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. House bill No. 718 is before the Senate; and the Senator from Rhode Island moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask the Senator to withdraw that motion for a moment and I will renew it.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Very well.

Mr. CONNESS. I am willing to stay here if there is the slightest chance of voting on this bill to-night, but we have been here already six hours and a quarter and I find that Senators all around have amendments to offer; there is no prospect of getting through. I hope, therefore, we shall adjourn. I renew the motion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I consider it my duty to ask for the yeas and nays. The matter is at the disposition of the Senate. They can do as they see fit.

YEAS—Messrs. Conness, Davis, Grimes, Henderson, Norton, Patterson, and Sprague—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Cragin, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foss, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Howard, Kirkwood, Morrill, Portland, Sherman, Stewart, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Williams, and Wilson—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Cowan, Cresswell, Dixon, Fowler, Guthrie, Harris, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Lane, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, Sumner, Trumbull, and Yates—24.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move an amendment: to strike out in line six hundred and ninety-two of section nine on page 69, the word "two," and insert "three;" so as to read:

On white oxide of zinc, or zinc paint, dry, three cents per pound.

This interest is a new and important interest in this country.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The committee do not make any objection to that increase.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. On the fortieth page, line seventy, of section eight, I move to strike out "three," and insert "four;" so as to read:

On zinc in sheets, four cents per pound.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is rather high. Put it at three and a half cents and we shall make no objection.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Very well. I will take three and a half; and I so modify my amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Now in line sixty-eight of that section I move to make the duty "on zinc, spelter, or teutenague, in blocks or pigs," two and half cents instead of two cents per pound.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I make no objection to that.

Mr. FOSTER. To that portion of the amendment which relates to spelter I must object. It will increase the cost of various manufactures that are made up of this article to a very great extent. The duties imposed by the bill to protect those manufactures are adjusted to the duty at the rate of two cents per pound; that is an increase on the present rate; and the increase of duties on the various manufactured articles is not so much relatively as on this item, as the bill stands. The attention of the chairman of the Committee on Finance was called to it, and I understood him to agree that, in his opinion, putting the duty on spelter at two cents a pound was putting it higher relatively than the duties on articles manufactured from spelter, as now arranged in the bill. This addition will make it impossible for the manufacturers to go on without an increase of duties on articles into the manufacture of which spelter enters as a component part. If you increase the duty on that, as now proposed, I think there will be an end to the manufacture of the articles into which this enters. That is my belief.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. This article is imported from Prussia to a considerable extent, and there labor is two shillings a day; here it is $2 50 a day. This is an article which is found in very many of our States east and west, and an interest which ought to be fostered in this country. It is not one of those interests that exist in the future, and in mere imagination, but is now established, and this country is able to supply all that is required of this most important article. I hope that the amendment will prevail.

Mr. FOSTER. The article is used very little in the condition in which this clause of the bill supposes it to be. It is amalgamated with other metals, and so makes up various articles that go into use in the country. In that way a large amount of labor is employed. Now, if you increase the price of this material, which goes into and makes up a component part of many other articles of manufacture, without increasing the duties on those several articles, you will not be protecting home labor; you will be doing the exact reverse. If the protection given to this article as a raw material is greater than that to the articles manufactured from it, the foreign manufactured articles will be imported, and there will be no demand for this. Thus you will be giving to American labor with one hand and taking away with two.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is precisely the principle that has been adopted with regard to other things to-day.

Mr. FOSTER. I am aware of that; but I hoped the Senate would stop at some point—possibly here. If they are not to stop at all, of course I must submit.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. This article is imported at five cents in gold and sold in New York at nine cents currency. If very little use be made of it by manufacturers, it will do those who the learned Senator from Connecticut fears will be injured by it very little damage. I insist respectfully that an interest like this, which is already established in this country for the production of an article that we have in a great many of the States, ought to be fostered and protected; and I hope the amendment, which it seems is not disagreeable to the committee, will prevail.

Mr. FOSTER. In connection with this amendment I wish to say a word with regard to a kindred item on the preceding page of the bill, the thirty-ninth page. Line fifty-one on that page, as reported by the committee, stood: "On nickel fifteen per cent. ad valorem." The report of the committee has been amended by adding to this line the words "and thirty cents per pound." The same argument which the honorable Senator from New Jersey uses in regard to zinc and spelter is applicable, as I understand, to nickel, and it illustrates the effect. There is in this country one establishment for the manufacture of nickel, and only one. The amount of capital invested is some one hundred and fifty or two hundred thousand dollars at the outside. Now, there are in the State of Connecticut manufactures of German-silver ware into which nickel enters as a very important part; it is one of the most important metals that goes into the manufacture of that ware, in which more than three million dollars of capital are invested. During the past year those manufacturers paid more than two hundred thousand dollars of internal taxes to this Government. It is now proposed to make nickel so expensive that those works must stop or do business at a loss; and for what purpose? To build up a manufacturing establishment where less capital is invested than these works are paying to the Government in internal revenue year by year. Thus, to say nothing of the amount of private individual loss, the Government strikes from its own Treasury a larger amount than the whole amount invested in the nickel works.

The same thing is not precisely true of spelter and zinc; but the same principle is involved. You are building up the manufacture of these as raw materials; no, no, I must beg pardon for calling them raw materials, because it seems now that there is no raw material in this country. The ice, I suppose, is not a raw material; the air, I suppose, is not a raw material; certainly we have learned in the course of the debate that iron ores and copper ores which had been previously supposed to be raw materials are not so. But for convenience sake and in popular language I hope to be pardoned for speaking of these as raw materials. We are putting a duty which shall enable these that have been previously called raw materials to be made in this country, and we are striking down all the establishments where they are manufactured. If that is wisdom I shall now learn it for the first time.

Mr. GRIMES. I am really astonished to hear such an argument against this proposition as has been urged by the Senator from Connecticut, namely, that the effect of it will be to increase the price of materials that are to be used in the different households of this country. I understand that that is the very principle on which the bill is predicated; and it is upon that principle we propose that this nation shall grow rich and all the people in it. This article of zinc is an article of universal consumption. There is hardly a family in the land that has not articles of some description or other that are made of this material. I suppose there is not a stove in my State that has not a plate of zinc beneath it. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] suggests that in some portions of his State they make shoes of it. [Laughter.] I have never seen it used in my State for that purpose. Now, it is proposed, for the sake of encouraging the production of zinc in the State of New Jersey, that we shall impose an additional tax on all the people throughout the country upon such articles as zinc and spelter and tutenague may be made into. I shall of course vote against this amendment; but I cannot conceive how the Senator from Connecticut, who I understand to be in favor of the general proposition of the bill, can interpose any objection to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President, I am in favor of protecting home industry, but I am not in favor of protecting it in the way that is here suggested; and if this bill is finally brought into such a position as a few amendments of this sort would place it, I shall be compelled, acting upon the principle of voting in favor of protecting American industry, to vote against it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. In reference to this little article which I have named, one establishment during the years 1863, 1864, and 1865 paid $80,000 to the Government in the way of taxes. One establishment pays out in wages $50,000 a month. What nickel has got to do with this question of zinc, or what the relations of the two subjects are, I am not aware. And in reference to this whole tariff bill, to which allusion has been made, it is not a question of political economy for us to discuss at all, in my apprehension; it is just a question of necessity; that is all there is of it. We have got to have a gold revenue to pay our debt. The only possible source to which we can look for it is our tariff income; and the gentlemen who have framed this bill assure the Senate and assure the country that this bill will give us a larger gold income with a smaller importation of goods; and I believe it. That is the assurance given by the committee, and I believe it. Then, further, we must tax the manufacturer, because we have got the interest of the debt to pay. The manufacturer cannot pay the tax unless he is protected in his manufactures. The manufacturer must live as becomes a freeman and a citizen of this country, and we must have a duty on goods imported; we must make the foreign manufacturer pay a tribute into our Treasury equal to the difference between the living of the laborer here and the living of the pauper of Europe. It is a matter of necessity.

It is said that the consumer will have to pay more for his goods. I do not know that the consumer will have to pay any more for the goods that he uses than he would have to pay in taxes if you relieved the manufacturer from his taxation. At all events, by the imposition of these duties a home market is created, and every man who is engaged in labor has the benefit of that home market, and those who are not engaged in labor, by the appreciated wealth of the country in the increase of their property have the benefit of this tariff.

As to commerce, commerce is promoted by this tariff. Let there be a uniform tariff in this country, one that does not vary from year to year, and we shall have manufactures that will supply and command the whole market of the East, with our railroad across the continent and our steamers on the Pacific ocean. For us to throw away the growing market of this country to foreigners, to take the very life-blood out of this young Republic and transfuse it into the arteries of the old kingdoms of Europe, would be an enormity. It seems to me that we should place ourselves in the class of those who forget their own household.

I hope that this bill will pass. I hope that it will be perfected. The whole country are indebted to the laborious attention that the committee and commissioner have given to this bill; but at the same time, as a matter of course, in some of its details it is capable of being improved; and on this question of spelter for ingots of zinc, disconnected from nickel, I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. GRIMES. I have been enlightened by the Senator from New York on two points: first, that no question of political economy enters into or has controlled the committee in preparing this bill, or should govern us in voting for it. I judged as much before, but I was not aware of it until I heard the statement authoritatively made by a gentleman who is a strong advocate, as I understand, of the measure. I should like to address to him one inquiry: if it be true, as I understand from his argument he asserts it is, that all classes in this country are to be equally protected under our tariff law—this permanent tariff law that he speaks of—will we not occupy the same position that we do now? Who is going to be benefited and who is going to be injured, and where is the money to come from with which to support the Government?

But I am instructed upon another point, and that is, that the Committee on Finance have informed the Senate and the country that under this bill there will be a smaller amount of imports and a greater or an equal amount of gold realized to the Treasury than under the present tariff law. I am aware that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] made that statement the other day; and I undertook to ascertain, if I could, in what manner he proved it; but I came to the conclusion that it was a mere expression of his judgment, such as all of us can entertain perhaps, one probably with as much accuracy as another. But the committee have made no such report as that. I have not heard any such declaration as that from the chairman of the Committee on Finance. I hardly think he will be willing to make that statement; I hardly think the Secretary of the Treasury will be willing to make that statement; and I suspect there are hardly more than two or three members of this body who concur with the Senator from Ohio in that expression of opinion. The truth is, Mr. President, you will not raise as much revenue under this tariff as you did last year by $50,000,000. That is a mere assertion of mine I know.

Mr. SHERMAN. Nobody claims that we shall.

Mr. GRIMES. I understand the Senator from Ohio says that nobody claims that we shall raise within $50,000,000 as much as we did last year.

Mr. SHERMAN. But I say that this tariff as it stood—not if you are going to pile duties upon duties, but as it stood—I think will raise considerably more revenue than the existing tariff during the same time.

Mr. CATTELL. If the Senator from Iowa will permit me, I made the same statement in my remarks, and I said I thought the distinguished chairman of the committee would perhaps agree with me, that the amount of revenue would be about the same under this as under the last tariff; that it would not change much; but I took occasion then to state that the amount of customs receipts would unquestionably, for certain causes, be reduced the coming year. I have no doubt it will be forty or fifty millions less, and I hope it will be.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senate ready for the question on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question being put, there were on a division—yeas five.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask for the yeas and nays. It will be necessary to have the yeas and nays in order to get a quorum. There is not a quorum voting on the division.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 8, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Creswell, Frelinghuysen, Howe, Van Winkle, Wade, and Willey—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cragin, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Foster, Grimes, Henderson, Kirkwood, Lane, Morrill, Poland, Sherman, Williams, and Wilson—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Fowler, Guthrie, Harris, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Patterson, Pomeroy, Ramsay, Riddle, Ross, Sausbury, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, and Yates—27.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this question the yeas are 8, and the nays 17; no quorum voting.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 25, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

DEFENSE OF THE NORTHEASTERN FRONTIER.

Mr. PATTERSON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill to provide for the defense of the northeastern frontier; which was read a first and second time, recommitted, and with the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. ORTH, by unanimous consent, submitted the views of the minority of the committee; which were also ordered to be printed.

Mr. PATTERSON entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted.

Mr. ORTH moved that one thousand extra copies of the majority and minority reports be printed for the use of the House.

The motion, under the law, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

REMOVAL OF WRECK IN NEW YORK HARBOR.

Mr. DODGE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution No. 156, to provide for the removal of the wreck of the iron steamship Scotland, on the bar outside of Sandy Hook, and to put it upon its passage. The joint resolution has been here since the 10th instant. It is a matter of great importance this sunken wreck should be removed, as during the late storm, lying as it does at the entrance to New York harbor, it was a serious obstruction to navigation.

There was no objection; and the joint resolution was taken up and read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was then ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. DODGE demanded the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof, the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. DODGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RAILROAD IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. LONGYEAR, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to extend the time for the reversion of the lands granted by Congress to aid in the construction of a railroad from Amboy via Hillsdale and Lansing to some point on or near Traverse bay, in the State of Michigan, and for the completion of said road," approved July 3, 1866; which was read a second and third time, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

INDIAN SUPERINTENDENCY IN COLORADO.

Mr. BRADFORD, by unanimous consent, offered the following preamble and resolutions; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas it is represented that gross frauds and irregularities have been committed in disbursing the money appropriated for the Indian service in Colorado Territory, for the years ending June 30, 1866, and June 30, 1867: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire in what manner and for what purposes the moneys so appropriated have been expended by the superintendent of Indian affairs for the Colorado superintendency, and particularly to ascertain how much money has been paid to one M. B. Cummings for services as clerk of said superintendency, what service the said M. B. Cummings has performed, and where he or she resides, and report the facts so ascertained to this House at their earliest convenience.

And be it further resolved, That said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER stated as the regular order the call of committees for reports of a private nature, commencing with the Committee on Naval Affairs, the pending question being on the report made last Saturday by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] from that committee.

PAUL S. FORBES.

The House accordingly resumed the consideration of joint resolution of the Senate No. 99, for the relief of Paul S. Forbes, under his contract with the Navy Department for building and furnishing the steam screw sloop-of-war Idaho.

The resolution authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to accept the steam screw sloop-of-war Idaho of the contractor, Mr. Forbes, at the contract price of $600,000, or transfer the said vessel to the contractor on the latter giving bond with sufficient security to refund to the Department, within six months from the date of such transfer, all advances of money made by the Government to the said Forbes on account of the construction and equipment of said vessel.

Mr. KELLEY. I request the reading of the petition of Mr. Forbes, being the most condensed statement that could be made of the case.

The Clerk read the petition, as follows:

To the honorable, the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:
The petition of Paul S. Forbes, of the city of New York, respectfully represents that the petitioner is a merchant and ship-owner, having had a large number of steamers of various kinds built in New York to compete with English-built steamers in China, and always with success. In the course of his business your petitioner became familiar with the methods of construction of ships and with the engineers and builders, who have been employed by him to build his steamers, and it occurred to your petitioner that he might possibly be of some service to the United States by the use of his experience in procuring for them a steamer, to be built as a fast cruiser, and to combine the advantages which in his private steamers had been productive of the results of high speed and great economy.

With this view, and without any design or intention to make money out of the United States, he procured estimates to be made by builders and engineers of the probable cost of a sloop-of-war of three thousand tons burden as if the vessel were to be built for his own private use, and having procured these estimates he proposed to the Secretary of the Navy that he would undertake as the agent of the Navy Department to have built for the United States a sloop-of-war of the proposed size for the actual cost in money for which the mechanical work could be done, charging nothing for his own services or time, and assigning to the Navy Department the contracts he might make, or permitting the officers of the Department to make contracts on the plans proposed, as the Department thought most advantageous. The Navy Department at once approved of the general plan of the vessel, but objected to making a contract for an indefinite amount, which might vary largely from the estimated one. The Secretary, however, proposed to make a contract with your petitioner to have such a vessel built for the price it had been estimated to cost at that time, which was $600,000 for the hull, spars, standing rigging, and machinery, and in order to advance the interest of the United States your petitioner accepted the contract, relying upon the estimates which he had procured, and which would have paid for the ship on the basis of currency, material, and labor as they were at the time of making the contract. Your petitioner at once employed Mr. Henry Steers, of New York, to build the hull by day's work, in order to secure the best result, and the Morgan Iron Works to build the machinery by day's work, under the superintendence of the engineer employed by your petitioner for that purpose. Soon after the work began, however, a very rapid rise occurred in the price of labor and materials resulting from the acts of the United States, and as a consequence the estimates upon which this vessel had been ordered at once were insufficient, and now your petitioner has paid out more money than the entire contract price, and the ship is not yet completed, although every exertion has been made by your petitioner to have the work done as rapidly as possible.

And your petitioner further sheweth that immediately after the vessel building under this contract was commenced, the Navy Department ordered the construction of six more similar to it, which were designed to be of the same size, but which have been somewhat lengthened, although not otherwise altered. These ships are building, except one, at the navy-yards; but the Department procured contracts for building the engines from engine-builders, and the contract price of the engines alone is $750,000, which is $150,000 more than the entire price of the ship and engines constructed by your petitioner.

Your petitioner submits that as the spirit of his contract was not to make money for himself, but that he should act as the agent of the Government in procuring others to build a steamer, so he ought not to be required to lose money by reason of the change in prices occasioned by the act of the Government; he is not a ship-builder nor a manufacturer, and his only desire was to serve the country without profit or loss to himself.

Your petitioner therefore respectfully solicits that he may be relieved from the situation in which he is placed by the said contract, by such an act as will in effect carry out the true intention of his offer to the Government, and to this end he proposes any of the following methods which may be selected for that purpose—either,

1. That the price of $600,000 be increased in the same ratio that the price of labor and material has increased since the estimates were made, on which he proposed to have said ship built; or,

2. That the actual bills paid or to be paid by your petitioner to the persons employed by him to do the work be paid by the Government; or,

3. That the price paid by the Government for the similar ships and engines built by contract be paid your petitioner.

Your petitioner further represents that the ship in question, the Idaho, is nearer completion than any other of the large vessels now building, and can be got ready for use sooner than any other of the vessels of that class.

Your petitioner has only received from the United States $300,000, and has paid out more than $600,000, and the amount still needed to complete the ship will increase the expenditure required to be made by your petitioner, on account of the United States, to the extent of $300,000 more, as is estimated by the machinists.

Your petitioner, therefore, asks that speedy action may be taken by the Government in order to provide the funds necessary for the completion of the vessel expeditiously, that she may be enabled to render the service for which she was built and for which she is now much needed.

PAUL S. FORBES.

Mr. KELLEY. I now ask to have the Senate report on this subject read.

The report was read, as follows:

"The papers in this case shows that on the 22d day of May, 1863, Paul S. Forbes entered into contract with the Navy Department to build a steam screw sloop-of-war, and to deliver her to the Government fully completed within a period of nine months from the date of contract, which vessel he also guaranteed should have a capacity of speed equal to fifteen knots an hour. The contract price for the vessel was the sum of $600,000.

"It appears that instead of the vessel being delivered to the Government in nine months from the date of contract she is not yet completely finished. And it further appears that the vessel fails also in the requisite of speed, and is not capable of making the fifteen knots an hour required by the terms of the contract.

"The Navy Department admits, and your committee fully believe, that Mr. Forbes was actuated by patriotic motives in entering into this contract. He is a merchant and ship-owner, and has had a large number of steamers built for the merchant marine, and with marked success. At a time when the exigencies of the country demanded a large increase of the Navy, and when every effort in that direction was an effort for the public good, Mr. Forbes, fully believing that he would thereby do the country a service, came forward with his proposition to build the aforesaid vessel. He did not expect to make any money thereby, but he believed that he could, with his experience and energy, furnish the Navy with a superior vessel in a brief period, and thus assist the country materially in the conflict with her foes. The Secretary of the Navy, in a communication to the committee upon this subject, says upon this point: 'That Mr. Forbes did not engage in this work from mercenary or pecuniary motives, I have always believed.'

He persuaded himself, or was persuaded by others, that he could in a brief time build a vessel possessing superior qualities to any which the Navy Department could build.

Your committee are informed, and believe, that the vessel in question has cost Mr. Forbes some three hundred thousand dollars above the contract price, or some nine hundred thousand dollars in all. They are also informed that, with the exception of the engine, the vessel is well built, and that she is fully worth to the Government, notwithstanding the deficiencies of her engines, the amount of the contract price. Your committee, therefore, in view of this fact, and in consideration of the patriotic motives which prompted Mr. Forbes to enter into the contract, and also in consideration of the fact that the Government is enabled to profit by the knowledge and experience derived from such experiments, feel warranted in recommending, as they do, that Mr. Forbes be released from his contract for the construction and furnishing of the steam screw sloop-of-war Idaho, and that the Navy Department be authorized to purchase the vessel, when completed, at a cost not exceeding the contract price. If, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy, the interests of the Government may be the better subserved, he is empowered to transfer to the said Paul S. Forbes the said vessel when the said Forbes shall give good and sufficient guarantee that he will refund to the Government, within six months from the date of said transfer, all moneys advanced by the Government to him on his contract for the building and furnishing of the said vessel. Your committee, therefore, report the accompanying joint resolution.

Mr. SPALDING. I know something about this case, for I was on the Naval Committee when it was fully examined, and the parties to it were heard with their testimony. I am satisfied that this measure in its inception was one of speculation. It proposed to introduce into the Navy a ship propelled by an engine which would compete with all the engines then in use in the Navy, and, in order to induce the Navy Department to enter into a contract, this contractor stipulated that he would build a ship capable of running fifteen knots an hour. The Department had no faith in this, but they agreed that the ship, when built, should be put on trial, and that it should come up to that rate of speed or else the Department should not be under obligation to accept of the vessel. Now, it has proved to be impossible for Mr. Forbes to make a ship that can accomplish that rate of speed with the motive power which he placed within her. She ran eight or ten knots an hour on the trial trip; and it is now proposed that, notwithstanding the Government had taken bonds that the vessel should be completed so as to run at a particular rate of speed, to receive this vessel, which has only the capacity of running eight or ten knots an hour, and to pay the full price under the contract.

Now, sir, with all the disposition in the world to accommodate Mr. Forbes, I protest against any such action on the part of the House.

I am in favor of the joint resolution as it came from the Senate, which would give to the Secretary of the Navy discretion either to receive back the money from Mr. Forbes or else to take the vessel at the contract price.

Now, it seems to me that these terms are as just and liberal as Mr. Forbes has a right to expect at the hands of Congress.

I will vote for the resolution as it came from the Senate, but I will not vote for this amendment which instructs the Secretary of the Navy to take the ship at the contract price and pay $600,000 for her when she does not come up to the rate of speed which it was contracted that she should attain.

Vessels such as this are not particularly wanted now in the Navy. I would give to the Secretary of the Navy power either to take the vessel at the contract price or to receive from Mr Forbes the money advanced to him and let him take the ship and make the most he can of it.

Mr. KELLEY. In reply to the gentleman from Ohio, I will say that while the amendment proposes to give the contract price for this vessel, it will still leave this patriotic citizen who engaged in the work of improving our naval architecture a loser of $300,000.

Mr. SPALDING. That may be.

Mr. KELLEY. With that statement I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] if the Committee on Naval Affairs was unanimous in this report?

Mr. KELLEY. I cannot answer that question precisely. My recollection is that all the gentlemen who were present at the meeting of the committee at which the amendment was adopted, and it was an unusually full meeting, favored it.

Mr. PIKE. I was not in favor of it.

Mr. KELLEY. Then there was one, and only one, who was opposed to it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman is mistaken as to the vote on the amendment.

Mr. KELLEY. I give my recollection of what took place in committee. I do not assert it as a fact.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I was present in the committee, and I did not agree to this amendment.

Mr. BAKER. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question. It is this: whether the Government of the United States is now so far needing the ship as to justify us in paying $600,000 for it, though we are under no obligation to do it?

Mr. KELLEY. I do not know the needs of the Government in that respect.

Mr. PIKE. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. KELLEY. I will.

Mr. PIKE. I desire to say that I was content to let this measure pass sub silentio, simply voting against it, until the inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] was made, for the purpose of developing the opinions of the committee.

Mr. Forbes, who is well known as a merchant of great enterprise as well of great generosity of character, was led into this undertaking to construct the Idaho by the very generous idea of surpassing by his individual effort all the previous exertions of the Navy Department to produce valuable, and especially fast, ships-of-war. In order to accomplish that purpose he entered into this contract, and, as I believe, with no expectation of making money out of it, for the contract itself was an unusually hard one. He proposed for the small sum of $600,000 to produce a ship of some two thousand five hundred or three thousand tons, which should do what no naval ship before did, make fifteen knots an hour for twenty-four consecutive hours in the sea-way, with all her armament on board. That was something which never had been done on either side of the Atlantic. But he was led to make the proposition by the ingenious theories and fertile suggestions of his engineer, a gentleman well known to the public, Mr. Dickinson.

In pursuance of that contract Mr. Forbes has already expended some nine hundred thousand dollars. He has received from the Government $550,000; losing, as I believe, over three hundred and fifty thousand dollars by his enterprising exertions. Now, for one I was entirely willing to say to Mr. Forbes, "You have already lost enough, and the Government has lost enough by this experiment; we will not call upon you to return any portion of this $550,000, but we will take the vessel and call the matter square." According to the terms of the contract he would be obliged to refund this $550,000 and take back the ship, for she fulfills no one of the conditions of the contract; and she is practically of but small value to the Government. The Government estimates that she is worth between one and two hundred thousand dollars for their purposes.

Mr. BAKER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PIKE. Certainly.

Mr. BAKER. If the ship is of practically but small value to the Government, and the Government is under no legal obligation to pay for it, why should we pay $600,000 for the ship?

Mr. PIKE. I will reply to the gentleman. The Government has made many experiments during the war; and in that respect the Navy Department has been very much misunderstood. It has expended very large sums in experimenting, as all Governments must do if they would produce that most difficult thing to produce, a perfect ship-of-war. Large sums of money have been expended, not only by this Government, but by the British Government and the French Government, in making experiments which when they are accomplished and the money is spent prove to be of little practical benefit, except to direct the future exertions of the Government.

Some years ago, Mr. Stevens, of New Jersey, attempted to produce an iron-clad ship. The Government furnished him $500,000. The ship was made and she lay on the stocks a long time, and was known as Mr. Stevens's battery, and this House at a prior session, after considering all the facts in that case, said to Mr. Stevens: "We will give you $500,000, and you may keep your battery. This loss the Government is willing to share with the individual who attempts to improve the Navy."

Now, in the case of Mr. Forbes, I was willing that the Government should share the loss and not attempt to crush him. This sum, although very considerable to the individual, is very small to the Government when compared to the contribution it would oblige the bondsmen of Mr. Forbes to make if the contract is insisted upon. For that reason I was willing to have the Government receive this ship for the sum of $550,000, which is the sum already paid, and discharge Mr. Forbes from any further proceedings on the contract. The result will be that the Government will sustain a loss, and Mr. Forbes will also sustain a loss of $350,000. And I submit to the members of this House that this would be a very small contribution on the part of this Government to citizens who have endeavored to aid it.

Mr. GRINNELL. I would ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] why he objected to this bill in committee?

Mr. PIKE. The original bill provides simply a discretionary authority on the part of the Secretary of the Navy. The proposition I make is to give direction to the Secretary of the Navy to receive the ship for the amount already paid.

The question was upon the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. BAKER called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 58, nays 84, not voting 49; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Banks, Barker, Bergen, Bidwell, Blaine, Brannan, Chandler, Conkling, Darling, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Eggleston, Eliot, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, Demas Hubbard, Jenckes, Kasson, Kelley, Ketcham, Laffin, George V. So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BAKER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question recurred on ordering the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. PIKE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered on the bill.

The SPEAKER. That motion cannot be made at the present time. It will not be in order till after the vote on ordering the bill to a third reading. The Digest states on page 143 that "it is not in order to move a reconsideration of the vote on ordering the main question when it is partly executed." That is the case here.

Mr. HILL. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

Mr. PIKE. What I desire is an opportunity to offer the amendment which I suggested to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. That is certainly a very proper amendment; and I hope by general consent it will be adopted. I am sure that no gentleman who understands this matter is willing to ruin Mr. Forbes.

Mr. SPALDING. Does the question turn now on the original proposition of the Senate?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. PIKE. I think that my friend from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] when he understands this question, will act in conjunction with me.

Mr. HILL. At the suggestion of several gentlemen who desire a direct vote on the passage of the bill, I withdraw the motion to lay the bill on the table.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. PIKE. I now move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading. If this motion shall be adopted I propose to offer an amendment which will simply allow Mr. Forbes to retain the money now in his hands, the Government taking the ship.

A MEMBER. How much money?

Mr. PIKE. Five hundred and fifty thousand dollars, for which the Government will receive a steamship that cost about nine hundred thousand dollars. I cannot say what is her worth, and no man can tell what is her worth. There are various opinions of her worth. The Navy Department estimates in one way and Mr. Forbes in another.

Mr. BAKER. The gentleman states that the Government will receive a ship costing $900,000 at an expenditure of about five hundred and fifty thousand dollars. My question is whether or not the gentleman is able to inform the House what the ship would be worth to the Government if it will not run more than eight or ten miles an hour, as stated by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING.]

Mr. PIKE. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois there are few ships in the American or any other Navy that will run over eight or ten miles an hour with an armament aboard. It is very good speed, ten knots an hour. There were few ships in our old Navy previous to this war, indeed I do not think there was a ship in that old Navy, which could run ten knots an hour.

Mr. BROMWELL. If the ship cost $900,000, and that sum was in fact judiciously expended, why is the builder here now trying to get $600,000 for it?

Mr. PIKE. I will reply to the gentleman from Illinois that the market for ships-of-war is limited, particularly when any foreign nations are engaged in war, for the Secretary of State steps in and says, "You shall not sell to either belligerents a ship-of-war." Mr. Forbes attempted to do this last year and was prevented by the action of the Government. Of course when these Governments are not at war, but in a state of peace, they have no need of armed ships; and when they are at war our Government will not allow armed ships to be sold to them.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would like to hear the gentleman from Maine express his opinion whether this vessel is or can be made valuable to the Government for naval purposes.

Mr. PIKE. I will say in reply that, opinions are various in regard to this ship. The Navy Department considers it of small value, while those who agree with Mr. Forbes in his ideas—engines similar to the one in this ship having worked well in the mercantile marine—think this ship will be of great value.

Mr. Forbes is acquainted in the East, having been largely engaged in mercantile affairs there. He has no doubt that if he had taken the ship to Japan last year and exhibited her there so that she might be tested by actual performance they would have bought her; but in his crippled condition he could not afford to take the ship out of the hands of the Government, and consequently there was no way of testing whether or not this ship is of practical value.

Mr. MAYNARD. My question was whether the Government could make this ship available for naval purposes.

Mr. PIKE. I will reply that I can only take the judgment of others. This is a handsome ship, and I esteem myself a judge at least of a commercial ship, as I have been engaged in shipping for a long time. But how valuable her engines are I cannot say. My motion is to reconsider for the purpose of submitting this amendment. I call the previous question, and I do hope the House will agree with me.

Mr. RAYMOND. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. PIKE. Certainly.

Mr. RAYMOND. I will consume but a few moments in saying one or two words.

I admit the entire propriety of the rule, as a rule, of enforcing all contracts made with those who undertake to serve it. I will refuse as a general thing to depart from that rule, but in this case I think there are considerations which make it an exception. If there was the slightest reason to believe there was any intention to make money out of the Government by this contract, if it were not absolutely certain the only motive Mr. Forbes had for entering into it was to serve the Navy during the rebellion, I should hesitate about voting for this joint resolution. But it is not so. Mr. Forbes has put into this ship every dollar he has received from the Government of the United States with $850,000 of his own money. It seems to me now no more than just, considering his motive, considering the sacrifice he must make in any case, the Government should not insist on his returning the money he has received, which it gets back in the ship together with $850,000 of his own, when, with some changes in machinery, which may be more or less expensive, it is the opinion of experts and engineers this ship may be made one of the most splendid ships in the Navy. He is deterred from selling her to any foreign Government at the only time foreign Governments wish to buy.

Unless it is considered proper for the Government of the United States to press to his ruin every man who undertakes to serve it, who has been unfortunate, having been misled into ventures which he could not carry through, it seems to me wise and equitable to pass the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Maine.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the vote by which the joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time was reconsidered.

Mr. PIKE. I now move to amend by striking out "$600,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$550,000;" and also by striking out the word "contract" before the word "price." I move the previous question.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield me three or four minutes?

Mr. PIKE. First let the previous question be seconded and then I will yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] will have no right to any time at this stage.

Mr. PIKE. If I have no time then I cannot yield of course.

Mr. SPALDING. How much of the morning hour is left?

The SPEAKER. Three or four minutes.

Mr. SPALDING. Then I object to any further debate.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. HILL. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

The amendment of Mr. PIKE was agreed to; and the joint resolution, as amended, was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. PIKE. I call the previous question on the passage of the joint resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. HILL. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 96, nays 52, not voting 43; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Bergen, Bidwell, Blaine, Boutwell, Boyer, Brandegee, Chanler, Conkling, Darling, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Eliot, Farnsworth, Garfield, Goodyear, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Higby, Hogan, Holmes, Hooper, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Hulburt, Humphrey, Hunter, Jencks, Johnson, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, Maynard, McIndoe, McKee, McKuer, Mercut, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Myers, Newell, Nicholson, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Plants, Pomerooy, Price, Raymond, John H. Rice, Rollins, Schenck, Sitgreaves, Spaulding, Starr, Stevens, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, John L. Thomas, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Welker, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Woodbridge—96.

NAYS—Messrs. Baker, Beaman, Benjamin, Bromwell, Broomall, Campbell, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cooper, Cullom, Dawson, Defrees, Delano, Denison, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hill, Hise, Koontz, Kuykendall, Leftwich, Marshall, Miller, Moulton, Niblack, Noell, Orth, Paine, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Sawyer, Seofield, Shanklin, Shelabarger, Sloan, Stillwell, Stokes, Thornton, Trimble, Trowbridge, Hamilton Ward, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, and Wright—52.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Arnell, Baldwin, Bingham, Blow, Buckland, Bundy, Sidney Clarke, Culver, Davis, Dawes, Dodge, Glessbrenner, Harris, Hart, Hawkins, Hayes, Henderson, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Ingersoll, Jones, Kerr, Ketcham, Latham, William Lawrence, McClurg, McCullough, O'Neill, Phelps, Radford, Alexander H. Rice, Rousseau, Thayer, Francis Thomas, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, and Whaley—43.

So the joint resolution was passed.

During the roll-call,

Mr. RANDALL of Pennsylvania stated that his colleague, Mr. GLESSBRENNER, was absent, being paired with Mr. O'NEILL on all questions.

The result having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. PIKE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. BROOMALL. I rise to a question of privilege arising out of a part of yesterday's debate as reported in the Globe of this morning. I ask that the part of the report which I have marked be read at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I said that when the gentleman from Pennsylvania charged Andrew Johnson with being a usurper, if I were permitted to quote the language of Marmon to Lord Douglas, I would say—

"Lord Angus, thou hast lied."

"Mr. KELLEY. If I were permitted! Sir, while the usurpation was plotting he was the confidential paid agent of the usurper, and knew all the secrets of the usurpation, and if conscience has not been extinguished in him he is not permitted to deny my allegation."

"Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is mistaken as to his facts. While I was the confidential agent and friend of the President of the United States, and I glory in the fact, not one dollar of his money has ever been handled by me; and when the gentleman says that I was his paid agent he lies again."

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask whether, before stating what I propose to offer under the rules of the House as a question of privilege—

Mr. ROGERS. I rise to a point of order. Can this be a question of privilege, as the words were not taken down at the time?

Mr. BROOMALL. My question has relation to that very point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not yet know what point the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] desires to make.

Mr. BROOMALL. I desire to ask the Chair whether, inasmuch as the objectionable words were not taken down at the instance of some gentleman objecting at the time, it is too late for the House to censure the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. JOHNSON. I submit that it is not a privileged question at all. The gentleman has stated no privileged question at all.

The SPEAKER. He stated that he rose to a question of privilege.

Mr. JOHNSON. Until he states what his question of privilege is he has no right to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] must state what his question of privilege is.

Mr. BROOMALL. Under the impression that the Chair will answer my question of privilege in the affirmative, I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the offensive language of the member from the fourth district of Tennessee on yesterday, during the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, though well meriting a vote of censure, would degrade nobody as much as himself, and that if his constituents are satisfied with it and him, the House of Representatives will not at present complain.

Mr. FINCK. I submit that this is not a resolution of censure, and I object to its introduction.

The SPEAKER. The Chair refers to page 76 of the Rules, as follows:

"If a member be called to order for words spoken in debate, the person calling him to order shall repeat the words excepted to, and they shall be taken down in writing at the Clerk's table, and no member shall be held to answer, or be subject to the censure of the House for words spoken in debate if any other member has spoken or other business has intervened after the words spoken and before exception to them shall have been taken."

The obvious inference from this rule is, that it is expected that some member upon the floor will certainly call a member who is out of order to order for using unparliamentary language, and then the rule provides that the words excepted to shall be taken down after being repeated by the member who has excepted to them. In this case no gentleman called the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] to
